Gymnast overcomes adversity on way to top

By ANDREW BRYCE
Collegian Staff

When UMass men's gymnastics senior co-captain Steve Christensen was asked on how he would sum up his college athletic career, his answer may have been different than any expected.

Maybe some would say something along the lines of "it's been great," or that "it couldn't have been better," but the UMass record holder answered the question negatively.

Christensen has been injury-prone throughout his collegiate career. During his freshman season, he blew out his ankle. Sophomore year, the same — another broken ankle. His junior year, Christensen separated not one, but both of his shoulders.

Injuries to ankles and shoulders are devastating to gymnasts. They can damage a career entirely, or limit it to a varying degree. Christensen is frustrated that these injuries may take away from his performance.

"Ever since I started gymnastics, I haven't been able to compete the way I can," Christensen said.

"Basically, if I wasn't team captain, I'd have a hell of a lot of trouble coming in here everyday. I have to motivate them, and when I help get other guys going, it helps get me going.

"It kind of depresses me. I can't do what I want to do. Even on the other events I'm doing now, like parallel bars, I'm still not doing what I used to.

"I can't do the rings ever again, and I can never compete in the all-around. All because of my shoulders."

Before coming to UMass, Christensen was the New Jersey state high school champion in his senior year. He credits former coach Donald Weider as his biggest influence in his 13 years of competing in gymnastics. Christensen says Weider helped him with the basics as well as motivation.

Christensen entered this season as a UMass record holder in two events, the parallel bars (9.40 set in his junior year against Army), and the pommel horse (9.65 also set in his junior year against Syracuse).

This season Christensen, despite the lingering shoulder problems, has broken his own pommel horse record. He scored a 9.70 on the pommel horse against Army last weekend. Christensen can achieve the most out of this event for various reasons.

Steve Christensen of the UMass men's gymnastics team has fought through many an injury to be at the top of his event, the pommel horse.

"[Pommel horse] was the first event I could come back to," Christensen said. "It hurts the least on pommel, so I can work out in this event a lot more and a lot harder than all the others."

Christensen is now going to turn his focus on two events for the rest of the season.

"Pommel horse and parallel bars — I'd like to go as far as I can with these two events. Hopefully, I can qualify for the Nationals on the pommel and qualify for regionals on pommel and parallel bar," Christensen said.

Christensen is admired by his teammates not only for his talent, but also his intelligence in the sport of gymnastics.

"He has the pure talent," junior co-captain Jay Santos said. "If you give him a move to do, he'll do it within a few days. His mind just works so perfectly on the spot. He's strong mentally and physically."

UMass head coach Roy Johnson notes that once he viewed his high school highlight tape, he knew that Christensen would be a star in the years to come.

"He's been a very consistent performer for UMass and has helped us win a lot of meets," said Johnson. "Not only is he very talented and has great work habits, but he knows what he can do, and he does it very, very well.

"If we can just get Steve to think positive, he could go onto the Nationals and be a contender for the title."

Fan calls for Chavez, Norris fight

Over 100,000 people filed into Mexico City last weekend to watch their hero Julio Caesar Chavez pound Greg Haugen into oblivion via fifth-round TKO. On the undercard "Terrible" Terry Norris destroyed Maurice Blocker in two rounds. Right now Chavez and Norris are at the top of their sport, looking down at everyone else and staring straight at each other.

Jeff
CROFTS

It is time for them to fight.

Chavez, currently a champion in the 140-pound junior welterweight division, is undefeated at 84-0 and is recognized as the best pound-for-pound fighter in the world. Norris, meanwhile, a king in the 154-pound super welterweight division, checks in at 33-3 and his recent streak of victories puts him on many people's list as the second best fighter on the planet. Behind Chavez of course.

It is time for them to fight.

In the early '80s, great fighters made great fights. Aaron Pryor took on Alexis Arguello in a bout which featured the world's two best fighters. Pryor knocked out Arguello in the 14th round of a riveting fight, and earned himself more praise for that one victory than all his other wins combined.

Who can forget Sugar Ray Leonard and Thomas Hearns going at it in their classic first fight which was won by Leonard when he rallied to knock out Hearns in the 14th?

Hearns engaged in another fight of huge magnitude when he squared off with Marvin Hagler in the mid-eighties for Hagler's uncrowned

College hoops close to March Madness

College Basketball Notebook
By Sean Hayden

Don't look now college hoop fans, but March Madness is right around the corner. A lot of the conference races are heating up and the tournament field is starting to come together, albeit very hazily.

Despite all the criticism he's received from the fans this year, you have to admit this about Derek Kellogg — he comes to play. No other Minuteman was as ready to play against URI last Saturday as he was. It seemed every time Kellogg was on the bench, the flow of the contest was in Rhody's favor. He came up with a couple of clutch shots and how about that tip-pass he made while diving for a loose ball.

Tough game this weekend down in Morgantown, W. Va., Coach Cal couldn't have asked for better scheduling though. He has a whole week to prepare for the Mountaineers, who are unbeaten at home in conference play so far this season.

Speaking of the A-10 and Rhode Island, my hat is off to Coach Al Skinner. It takes guts in this day of win-at-any-cost-college basketball to uphold the suspension of point guard Jason Alexander.

I think Jim O'Brien of Boston College would agree with me when I say that most other coaches would allow even an admitted criminal back on the team if it would help his chances of making the tournament. By reinstating the credit card-thieving Gerrod Abram, O'Brien is just proving that in prestigious Chestnut Hill, the tail really does wag the dog.

Duke is really blowing their chance of getting a favorable seed in the tournament, and Lord knows that's a difficult thing for them to do. The Blue Devils have long been the darling of the tournament selection committee and last week's loss to Virginia knocked them out of the running for the number one seed in the East Region. Look for the Dukies to go out west and be the second seed behind the Arizona Wildcats.

The Wildcats proved to all that they certainly do deserve their No. 4 ranking when they beat Cincinnati (No. 8 at the time). Arizona scored the final 12 points of the contest to come away with an impressive 70-60 triumph.

Another coup for the Pac-10 on the same day when Arizona State upset Anfernee "Penny" Hardaway and the Memphis State Tigers. MSU is definitely in the running for the bust team of the year in college basketball. So is UConn, but they've been playing well as of late.

With Alan Henderson out of the Indiana lineup indefinitely, North Carolina now appears to be the team to beat. As much as it pains me to admit, the Tarheels can do it all. They pass the ball like the 1985-86 Celtics and play the traditionally

Intramural ice hockey breaks in Mullins rink

By ANTHONY GUIDO
Collegian correspondent

There's been some very good action this month going on at the Mullins Center besides UMass men's basketball. It is the UMass intramural hockey league that is being played at the Mullins practice ice rink.

This league has everything you might expect from an intramural league, and there are a few things that might surprise, such as colorful team names as well as colorful players.

Last Tuesday night's action consisted of a lot of hitting which, like it or not, gets the crowd involved. The goaltending was superb for the most part and the overall level of play was higher than most would anticipate.

Fans who were attending saw everything from a breakaway goal by Delta Upsilon's Brian Gavigan to a bit of a skirmish which picked up the intensity even more.

In the most interesting game of the evening, it was a team creatively called the "Mother Puckers" defeating the Wolverines by a score of 3-1. The winning goal was scored by the team's leading scorer, Scott Storey. Mother Pucker team captain Dennis Cremin made game-saving save after save, preserving the victory.

The regular season is now winding down as the teams vie for playoff spots. The top eight teams in this nine-team league make the playoffs, which begin Feb. 28.

The action reaches its pinnacle with a Stanley Cup-like best of three championship series which takes place March 7 thru 11.

The defending champion "Hanson Brothers" have raced out to a 6-0 start

Insightful folk music with Bill Morrissey

by Bill Rogers / Collegian

Imagine the voice of Muddy Waters, the finesse of Robert Frost and the improvisational skills and crowd-working abilities of Robin Williams. O.K., now throw all of that together into one person with the face of Mike Milbury, the lanky appearance of Townes Van Zandt and the height of Mickey Rooney. Everything comfortable? What you have is Bill Morrissey, and you'll be able to catch him at the Iron Horse on Sunday night.

Morrissey has been described as a "swamp Yankee," a peculiar brand of bluesman that has quietly emerged into stardom from the backwaters of New England. He has left an unforgettable impression on the folk scene, particularly in the many coffeehouses and concert halls that pop up around every corner in the northeast. Morrissey is a pro who knows exactly how to take over and clean up shop. The acoustic folk elite is proud to call Morrissey a member of its group. Its tradition is one that goes back to Woody Guthrie and includes not only Bruce Springsteen and Tom Waits in their more folkish songs-of-the-common-man mode, but also John Prine and the early Bob Dylan.

"They call Morrissey a folk singer," wrote New England novelist Robert Olmstead, in one of his recent books, "but, to me, he is New England's own bluesman — not hot and humid delta blues, but deep snow and sharp pine blues. . .cabin fever blues of dead-end jobs and busted relationships, the place where life and consequence meet."

Morrissey's niche as a folky came from confidence, both from himself and his fans, in addition to obvious dedication to his craft. His work is consistently acclaimed and respected. With each album, the word spreads a little wider, hitting a few more people with each swing.

The American popular song is generally based on make believe and wishful thinking. Not Morrissey's, though. His lyrics show a sharp attention to details and emotions. He sings of life's facts and not its fictions: truths that had to be earned, hard-luck losses and the occasional sign of hope that makes it all worth the pain and suffering.

A good song moves you," said Morrissey. "I don't mean it has to change your life, but that you learn something, that something touches you that's very important at the time you're hearing it. Somebody once talked about writing being the process of bringing one world into another. It's like that, even if it's not necessarily telling you something you didn't already know."

Morrissey is a one-of-a-kind performer and a genuine crowd-pleaser. "When I first started playing coffeehouses and bars, what I did was talk a lot," said the fantastic folky. "If I was funny, I knew they'd hire me back. So I did a lot of improv — played off what was going on in the club." His pre-song stories alone will have members of the audience rolling on the floor, unable to speak because of a level of uncontrollable laughter that accumulates more and more with practically every word he says.

Another aspect of his show that attracts people is its ability to cheer up those in the audience who, for whatever reason, have had first hand experience dealing with the problems Morrissey brings up in his music. His songs range from a romanticized song about how little is known about delta blues legend Robert Johnson's life (Robert Johnson, "Each song comes from a whole inside where a soul had once been.") to one about a very strange relationship (Rite of Spring, "She called up Hinckley and told him I kissed Jodie. She's got her own kind of way of having fun.")

Morrissey grew up in Hartford, Conn. (and later Acton, Mass.). Soon after purchasing a beat-up guitar in high school, he spent most of his time honing his craft in the folk revival. He first started performing in bars while he was a student at Plymouth State College in New Hampshire.

Morrissey's first big break came in 1985 when he performed at the Newport Folk Festival in Rhode Island. After that, his credibility increased. He went on to record two albums for Rounder Records in Cambridge, Mass. Standing Eight, his third album, which Rolling Stone called a masterpiece, was a breakthrough. It caused people to begin taking notice to Morrissey's unique musical style.

Charlie's Tavern celebrates 15th anniversary

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

Operating a bar or a tavern, even in a college town such as Amherst, is never an easy task. Within five years of its opening, over 90 percent of the restaurants in America close.

Despite the rarity of longevity in the business, Charlie's Tavern, located at 1 Pray St., is celebrating its 15th anniversary this week.

"Each year you operate in this business is a victory," Richard Slobody, the owner of Charlie's, said. "With the constant transition in our industry, it is extra special when you make it."

Slobody cites three reasons for Charlie's staying power, its location, its ability to pay attention to its regulars and his conservative business sense.

"We haven't tried to get flamboyant," Slobody said. "We try to build upon a regular crowd by creating an atmosphere which makes Charlie's your home away from home. We have a relaxed, friendly atmosphere."

Slobody likes to call Charlie's the "Cheers of Amherst." "Cheers" is the long running NBC television series based on a fictional bar in Boston.

"When I first saw Cheers on television, I said 'that's Charlie's.'" Slobody said. "This is where everyone knows your name. Friends food and drink. No gimmicks, just an old style tavern."

And it has worked.

"We've had regulars for 15 years," Slobody said. "We are starting to get second generation patrons. Some of these kids' parents have been to Charlie's."

Charlie's is one of the few area bars which is neither exclusively a college bar nor a townie bar.

That is not surprising considering Slobody, 39, grew up in Leverett and attended Western New England College, where he was social chair of his fraternity. He is at home with both crowds and both crowds call his tavern home.

In celebration of Charlie's birthday, Slobody is offering 1978 prices on a few of his more popular items.

Donny Osmond dons a Dreamcoat for latest role

By KARI KRON
Generation X-Press

No more "Sweet and Innocent." No more "Puppy Love." He's not even a "Soldier of Love" anymore. With his past behind him, Donny Osmond is now earning a first-class musical theater reputation with the lead role in the musical Joseph and the Amazing Technicolor Dreamcoat by Andrew Lloyd Weber and Tim Rice.

Many still remember the Donny Osmond of the 70s. First, as a member of The Osmonds, then as a successful solo artist and teen idol with a string of 23 top hits in just nine years. Osmond hit the peak of his popularity in the late 70s when he and his sister Marie co-hosted their own variety hour, "The Donny and Marie Osmond Show."

After the show ended and the duo pursued separate careers, Osmond disappeared from the pop music scene until his breakthrough album Donny Osmond was released in 1989. The hits "Soldier of Love" and "Sacred Emotion" returned him to the musical spotlight as a credible singer and songwriter.

Before Osmond returned to the recording studio to create Donny Osmond, he had resurfaced briefly on Broadway with title role in Little Johnny Jones, a musical by George M. Cohan. The role brought little recognition for Osmond as a serious performer, which he attributes to timing and not being prepared for the role. As he explains it, "I wasn't really ready. It was Donny Osmond up there, and here wasn't any depth to the character."

His return to the pop charts after 10 years and the failure of Little Johnny Jones made his decision to star in Joseph and the Amazing Technicolor Dreamcoat difficult for Osmond. He would have to give up recording for a few years and face the musical critics again. However, Osmond stands by his decision.

"It's a step forward for me," he says. "Many people would say it's a safe move, but if you really dig into the character, there is so much more depth."

Joseph's character offers Osmond the meaning and depth that Little Johnny Jones didn't. Osmond says he notices strong differences between the two roles and his approach to them.

"When I do this show, I really try to become Joseph. I make Joseph my reality," he says.

To further his commitment to the role, Osmond spent hours researching Joseph's life, which is based on a tale from the bible. The story is about a 17-year-old boy who falters, struggles against forces beyond his control and at age 40 becomes the second most powerful man in Egypt (next to the Pharoh).

Osmond himself finds uncanny parallels between Joseph's life and his own. He was about 20 when his career ended, or as he puts it, was "left in the dust."

Ten years later, Osmond re-emerged as a musical success. And although these likenesses are fascinating, he sees some potential danger in taking them too seriously.

The director of the Minneapolis production of Joseph and the Amazing Technicolor Dreamcoat, Steven Pimlot, has given Osmond valuable advice to maintain the quality of his character.

"Steven told me that I can get into trouble with the parallels," Osmond says. "You don't want to anticipate the outcome of the story, which is a trap that may actors fall into. Use (the parallels), but use them wisely."

Like any performer, Osmond has dealt with his share of critics and criticism. As a former teen idol, he has had a tough time convincing critics that he is a legitimate performer.

"Teenage success, no matter how much talent you have, is really being in the right place at the right time. . . but (in my case) the critics forget "The Andy Williams Show," touring with the brothers, etc.," Osmond says.

COURTESY MICHAEL COOPER

Donny Osmond performing as Joseph in Andrew Lloyd Weber's "Joseph and the Amazing Technicolor Dreamcoat."

With both the album Donny Osmond and the role of Joseph, critics have now applauded his talents and are beginning to recognize his genuine abilities as a musical performer.

Despite musical critics' recent approval. Osmond still feels that some people do not take him seriously until "they see the show," he says.

Overcoming his past on a personal level has been difficult, too. "I had a lot of difficulties in my twenties, but my wife pulled me through," Osmond says. "That's what saved me — a stable family life and my religious beliefs."

"I made that mistake in my teens. My personal life was an open book, and I vowed never to let that happen again."

Still, Osmond says he will not prevent his children from pursuing a career similar to his. Instead, he views himself as a source of sound advice.

"I will help them avoid certain pitfalls, but you don't want to avoid too many pitfalls because it's the hard times

Blade Runner, a cult classic, is re-released

By MARTIN BROWN
Collegian Correspondent

You walk into the video store. You're not quite sure what movie you want to see so you walk over to the New Releases section. . . all the movies there you've either seen before or are leftovers like Beastmaster 2 or Blood Bath. So you start perusing through the store. . . you're moving faster and faster. . . getting more and more frustrated.

The minutes flash by. Beads of sweat roll into your eyes. . . steam pores out of your ears. Five minutes until closing and you finally find the movie your looking for. . . you run over to it with tears in your eyes only to find that all 17 copies are out. You fall to your knees in a bundle of misery and despair. The injustice of it all turns you into a blithering simp. You start muttering to your self, "Don't drink orange juice after brushing your teeth," over and over again. The little guys in white coats come and take you away.

BLADE RUNNER

Video Pick of the Week

O.K., since this is the first column on older movies that are great rentals and I'm not as funny as Roger Ebert. . . I think I'll start off with my favorite movie of all time — Blade Runner. It probably shouldn't be, but I can't think of a single better movie. Based loosely on the novel Do Androids Dream of Electric Sheep? by Philip K. Dick, the story takes place in Los Angeles in the year 2020.

Harrison Ford plays Deckard, a cop (blade runner) assigned to track down and eliminate four replicants (robots almost exactly like humans) lead by Roy Batty, a deadly military model ingeniously played by Rutger Hauer.

Ford puts in a solid performance with the thankless role of a man whose job is to kill people. Sean Young, in one of her first films, stands out as Rachel, a replicant who is not sure whether she's human or not. Other excellent performances are Daryl Hannah as the replicant Pris, M. Emmit Walsh as Police Chief Bryant, and Edward James Olmos as Gaff, another blade runner.

What makes the story so interesting are all the twists and questions that the movie reflects on. For instance, the replicants want to live more than the humans do in the movie. Or the ethics of a "Voight-Kampf Test" that tells whether you're human or not. Blade Runner has a wide array of stuff that will captivate you even if you don't like "cop" movies at all.

Visually, the movie is just awesome. Director Ridley Scott (Thelma & Louise, Alien) and special effects wizard Douglas Trumbull (2001, Close Encounters) have created a future incredibly vivid and disturbing. Usually, when you see older futuristic movies, they look dated (A Clockwork Orange, Star Wars). After 11 years, Blade Runner still holds up to the test of time if not improving with it. I can honestly see a future like Scott's vision happening.

Many critics have dissed the movie for the story, saying that Deckard is an unlikable character and the visual aspects of the movie crush him and the other characters. I strongly disagree. Part of the

Artist's exhibit enthralls the soul

Charcoal portrait series explores women's issues

By JESSICA TAVERNA

Jane Olivier
Johnson Library Center
Jan. 23-Feb. 19

Sharp black and whites embrace a glance and pierce the heart with an underlying message that enthralls the soul. Although the biting contrast of Jane Olivier's charcoal exhibit is what initially caught the eye of many at the Johnson Library Center's gallery at Hampshire College recently, there was a much deeper underlying meaning behind these intimate portraits.

Olivier's focus was the degradation of females in our society. Her two major series of charcoal portraits were the Mona Lisa series and the Motherload series.

The Mona Lisa series consisted of portraits of your basic "plain Janes." These were pictures of overweight women and women that society might consider unappealing.

She puts great emphasis on the unrealistic expectations that our society has on appearances. She makes a statement that makes the viewer perceive those expectations as purely superficial.

One of the subjects of the Mona Lisa series is an older, overweight women glaring out at her viewers. Although the strokes were executed harshly in a hurriedly fashion, one can still see the lines in the woman's face. Behind her thick framed glasses, are a pair of intense eyes that tell of her bouts with the inequalities society has dealt out to those women who aren't considered to be a "10."

The Motherload has a much more upbeat feel to it. It's constructed in a comic strip fashion with a story line isolated for each drawing.

It starts out with a woman wanting a baby, but getting a dog instead. The dog has pups and this inspires the woman to go through the impregnation process first hand. It shows the child as an infant, different stages of its childhood, and various momentous occasions.

Although, this segment of the exhibit has a tenderness to it and appears to be very cartoon-like and non-threatening, Olivier adds a hint of irony through subtle touch-ups. These touch-ups throw the viewer for a twist and force them to take a look at the underlying truths and realities Olivier feels are too often disregarded.

There is one particular portrait of an infant lying there, screaming his lungs out. If one was to look closely and examine the drawing, as I did, they would've noticed that, scraped into the black mat of charcoal encompassing the child, is an image of a gun. I took this as a symbol of a parent's frustration of dealing with a screaming child while trying to hold the homestead together and just feeling as if they'd come to their wits end.

She shoots for a less subtle approach with her picture of her son on Easter with his basket in hand — he's got this devilish smile on his face. Instead of making him look angelic, she made him look like an evil little egg-monger! That's probably how she perceived his appearance after a morning of Easter egg hell.

During brief moments in between all of the hustle and bustle of child rearing, Olivier produced an array of charcoal drawings and portraits geared towards issues and concerns of the housewife of the '90s. Frustrated with the devaluation of her role as a mother/artist, she was inspired to channel her aggressions by creating excerpts of charcoal hysteria.

She intentionally made the scale of her portraits larger-than-life to display the importance of domestic roles in society.

While balancing on the tightrope of sanity and attempting to conquer motherhood, Olivier allowed her talent and anguish to work hand-in-hand with a lowly medium to exemplify the beauty of the soul within and the frustrations attributed to the degradation of females' roles in our society.

A Jane Olivier Original.

South India's classical music amazes crowd

By ERICA PLOUFFE
Collegian Correspondent

Ragas for Peace
Buckley Recital Hall
Amherst College
Feb. 20, 1993

The Corliss Lamont Arts Project sponsored an evening of South Indian music at Buckley Recital Hall at Amherst College last Saturday evening. "Ragas for Peace," as it was called, is part of a series of cultural events taking place throughout the year at Amherst College.

A raga is the melodic system that is the basis of South India's religious classical music. Translated, it means "that which colors the mind." Although there were no words spoken or sung in this particular performance, the various instruments such as the veena, the tambura and the mridangam, seemed to speak to the audience in a soothing voice.

Ranganayaki Rajagopalan and David Reck played the veena, an instrument resembling the guitar. It is a highly ornamented instrument which took its present shape in the 1600s. It is carved and hollowed out of a single piece of jackwood.

Rajesh Ranganathan played the tambura, which is a stringed instrument similar to a bass. David Nelson's mridangam is a drum also constructed of jackwood and water buffalo hide. These hides can produce various pitches and sounds when struck on different areas.

The beautiful melodies these instruments produced put the entire audience into a meditative trance. In one particular piece called "Varanarada," Rajagopalan improvised an amazing work of art that few would dare to imitate.

Her musical career began at the age of four when she was sent by her parents to the guru Karaikudi Sambasiva Iyer to learn the veena. She carries on the traditional Karaikudi style of her mentor. Her fame in India has expanded her popularity in other parts of the world. She is currently a Copeland Fellow at Amherst College, teaching interested students the art of the veena.

All the instruments gave off sounds that were marked by lyrical intonation. The mridangam had a solo piece called "Eduta nilacite" that created a soothing and relaxing atmosphere that gave a strong rhythmic power for the rest of the performance.

The Imagining Peace: Corliss Lamont Arts Project brings together a series of diverse groups from the many different cultures of our world. It hopes to bring peace and tolerance on a local scale through the fine arts.

Osborne puts her spin on the Blues

By LISA CURTIS
Collegian Staff

Joan Osborne

A pioneer vocalist and lyricist, Joan Osborne is putting a spin on the blues. The songs she writes deal with contemporary political and sexual issues and have found a large audience among urbanites.

Songs like "I Live On This Street" illustrates her ability to take a very personal emotion and imbue it with a universal appeal.

"That's one I'm really proud of," Osborne says. "It's a song about how, sometimes when you walk down the street, there's tension, there's people hassling you, whether it's me as a woman, or whether it's somebody as a gay or a Black being hassled by whites or an Asian being hassled by Puerto Ricoans, or whatever. That's part of life in the city, and its's something that most of us have to deal with.

"It's an angry song, but it also attempts to get into the mind of the person who is flinging verbal abuse at you or grabbing his crotch at you, or whatever. [It tries] to examine that whole dynamic and acknowledge the feelings of being in the position of the person who's — I don't really know if you would call it the victim — the object of that aggression.

"I think most people when they're faced with that kind of situation, will just ignore it or pretend that it doesn't bother them not want to deal with that person and just sort of shrink a little bit. You just feel dehumanized by that so it produces a lot of anger, and that was certainly the impetus to write the song. It happened to me on the street where I lived. My response to it was, 'Wait a minute, I even live on this street. I do live here, I do have a right to be on this street and to walk in any way that I want to walk down this street and to wear whatever I want to wear and to be whoever I am."

In addition to Osborne's originals are some unbelievably performed covers. Rolling Stone magazine picked Osborne as the only unsigned artist chosen for their annual "New Faces of Rock" feature in 1992. They wrote, "Her covers of 'Son of a Preacher Man' and 'Lady Madonna' still rock the house (a typical Osborne show is captured on the Soul Show album, released on her own Womanly Hips label), but lately she's been concentrating on her less brassy original compositions."

A native of Anchorage, Kentucky, Joan moved to New York City, her current residence, to study filmmaking, but she became involved in the city's roots rock/rhythm and blues scene after walking into an open jam session four years ago. Since then she has been singing full time.

Osborne has been compared to Bonnie Raitt, Melissa Etheridge, Joan Armatrading, Janis Joplin and Aretha Franklin. And no wonder, she's received the 1990 New York Music Award for Best Unsigned Artist and the 1991 award for Best Debut Vocalist Independent Label for her self-released album Soul Show. She has performed with B.B. King, Spin Doctors, Blues Traveler, The Neville Brothers, Indigo Girls, Donald Fagen, Jorma Kaukonen, Buster Poindexter. . . the list goes on.

And yet the power of her convictions even extends beyond the stage. She is active in the Pro-Choice movement,the Brooklyn Pro-Choice Network and the Reproductive Rights Coalition.

Osborne agrees that her best form of communication is through song, however. "There are certain things about just singing a melody in a particular way or a note in a particular way or to be able to throw your head back and wail. That says something about you not in words but that is just as specific and just as powerful and it's something that people can connect with and say, 'Yes I know how that feels.' Whether they can sing that particular phrase like you or not doesn't matter. They know the emotions that's behind that and they know the feeling that that expresses it's like talking to a friend."

Stone called a masterpiece, was a breakthrough. It caused people to begin taking notice to Morrissey's unique musical style.

His most recent album, Inside, was the right album at the right time and as good, if not better, than the other three he recorded. It was recently named the number one folk album of the year by both the Boston Globe and Tower Records.

The four albums that Morrissey has done — Bill Morrissey (1984), North (1986), Standing Eight (1990) and Inside (1992) — have earned rave reviews, as well as a number of tracks on various concept albums. On March 15, Morrissey will be releasing his next Philo/Rounder Records album, Friend of Mine, which he recorded, double-bill, with Greg Brown, one of Morrissey's colleagues of coffeehouse fame. On March 1, Morrissey will bury himself in the studio again to record an album with his newly formed band (Johnny Cunningham, Top Topham, Richard Gates and Billy Conway).

Morrissey constantly receives honors for his work in the folk world. He was voted a recipient of a Billboard Magazine "Top Ten Critics' Choice Award," with other winners like Van Morrisson, Tom Petty and Paul McCartney. He also received a song of the year nomination at the Boston Music Awards for his song "Handsome Molly"... Aerosmith won. In addition to his awards, Morrissey and his music are frequent topics of stories in, to name a few, the Boston Globe, the New York Times and the Boston Phoenix.

Whatever Morrissey is doing, he is surely doing it right. He has been hitting the stages and winning the love of the crowds for many years now. In a normal year, he drives 30,000 miles to get to 120 shows. He drives from bar to bar to coffee house to coffee house to make a little money and have a good time doing it.

If you missed Morrissey when he visited Amherst College this past fall, please, for your own culturally enriched sake, don't miss him this time.

Bill Morrissey will be doing the folk thing at the Iron Horse in NoHo on Sunday night at 7 p.m. Tickets are $10.50 and must be ordered in advance from the Northampton Box Office (586-8686).

you learn from," Osmond says.

After Joseph, Osmond is unsure of what his next project will be. He is committed to Joseph and the Amazing Technicolor Dreamcoat until 1994, and there is some discussion about his assuming the role of Joseph in the show's London production. He owns a production company called Nightstar, which he hopes to work more closely with in the future. Or, he may decide to return to the recording studio and rejuvenate some of the notoriety he enjoyed in 1989.

So put aside the teen idol Donny Osmond in your memory bank and picture Donny Osmond in a new light, as the serious, talented performer that he is — dedicated to his professional and personal responsibilities and ready to lift his career to a higher plane of success.

point of the movie is to show how man is overwhelmed by all the technology and how he cannot handle it.

Admittedly Deckard is not your typical hero. At one point he states, "I'd rather be a killer than a victim," but by the end of the movie, Deckard is not the same man. Through a series of events he comes to the realization of how important life really is.

By the way, if you rent the movie, there is a 10th anniversary version that will probably not have the wear and tear of an older copy of the movie.

A Director's Cut of Blade Runner is also playing at the Academy of Music in Northampton. The difference between the rental and this "original cut" is one additional scene (about 16 seconds), no monologue, and a few scenes left out. The tacked-on ending in the rental version is cut out. I didn't particularly like the fact that Scott cut the monologue out, but seeing the movie on the big screen really brings a new dimension to the film.

For me, Blade Runner works on many levels. It is a dark vision of a possible future, a psychiatric examination of the human condition, and one hell of a thriller. If you haven't seen this movie, you really are missing out. Rated R. 114 minutes.

Clinton plans to meet with Boris Yeltsin

BY BARRY SCHWEID
Associated Press

GENEVA — President Clinton and Russian President Boris Yeltsin arranged Thursday to meet April 4 in a one-day summit designed to bolster Yeltsin at a critical time.

The meeting will be held in a third country, still to be selected. In announcing the summit, Secretary of State Warren M. Christopher said the United States is determined to support "the cause of reform in Russia."

Yeltsin is certain to press for aid beyond the $417 million in technical assistance budgeted for Russia and other former Soviet republics this year.

Christopher discussed "substantial aid" for Moscow with Russian Foreign Minister Andrei V. Kozyrev without getting into specific figures, U.S. officials said.

"We've established a good working relationship," Christopher said after his three-hour meeting with Kozyrev.

If Yeltsin is unable to compromise with conservative foes at home, he threatens to gamble on a showdown referendum which would occur on April 11.

It would then be up to the Russian people to finally settle whether Yeltsin or the Communist dominated parliament should hold supreme power.

Group plans GLB program

By SAM KENNEDY

The new Chancellor's Task Force for Lesbian, Gay and Bisexual Concerns is pushing to create a new academic program and improve services and resources for students at the University of Massachusetts.

The head of the task force, Professor Pat Griffen of the the University's School of Education, said the group is considering an academic program and possibly a major focusing on lesbian, gay and bisexual issues, but no time table has been set yet.

The task force plans to ask Chancellor Richard O'Brien to require all University agencies to review policies and literature to ensure sensitivity to lesbian, gay and bisexual concerns, Griffen said.

Global economy affects women

Analysis of disparities 'crucial' to upcoming conference

By SHYAMALA IVATURY
Special to the Collegian

Editors note: This editorial is the last of a five-part series leading up the Women's Conference on Feb. 27. Opinions expressed are not necessarily those of the Collegian.

An economic analysis is crucial to the understanding of the status and material conditions of women world-over. The 1993 Women's Conference, entitled "Empowering Women — Challenges and Prospects for the 21st Century," scheduled for tomorrow, will attempt to expose the economic gains made by women in the past few decades, and areas where they continue to remain exploited.

FOCUS on the 1993 Women's Conference: EmPOWERing Women

The world today has the opportunity to use global markets for the benefit of all people — to equalize income distribution. According to the 1992 United Nations Development Program (UNDP) report, the richest 20 percent of the world's population earns 82.7 percent of the total world's income. The poorest 20 percent of the world population earns only 1.4 percent of the total world's income.

In 1960, the richest 20 percent of the world's population had incomes 30 times greater than the poorest 20 percent. By 1990, the richest 20 percent were getting 60 times more than the poorest 20 percent. This comparison is based on the distribution between rich and poor countries. Adding the maldistribution within the countries, the richest 20 percent of the world's people get at least 150 times more than the poorest 20 percent.

The numbers indicate that income disparities are widening. We are living in a world where under the auspices of a free market, every individual is not guaranteed the right to work, right to decent meals, and health care.

The strongest benefits are gained in the financial markets. Developing nations enter the market as unequal partners and leave with unequal rewards. In areas where developing countries have a competitive edge, as John Harris warns his audience of potentially leaking condoms.

Speaker says condom failure is reason for spread of AIDS

By DIANA D'AVANZO
Collegian Staff

An attitude of "it won't happen to me" is the main factor behind the rapid spread of AIDS, followed by a rejection of sexual abstinence and overconfidence in the protection offered by condoms, according to a recent speaker at the University of Massachusetts.

"This virus doesn't discriminate. . . People have bought into the myth that it won't happen to them," said John Harris, a traveling speaker with the Campus Crusade for Christ.

Harris, who spoke Tuesday and Wednesday night in the Student Union Ballroom, has been studying AIDS and its social implications for the past eight years, and has spoken at several national conferences on trends in sexual behavior among students.

Harris described AIDS as "a predictable, progressive disease...a treatable, chronic illness...and preventable." He added that, though the disease is treatable, it is "not curable, because the virus becomes part of the genetic information." He said the virus is especially treacherous because it is found in all bodily fluids, "but at different concentration levels at different times."

Harris described what he considers the top three reasons for the rapid spread of the disease. He said the "it won't happen to me" attitude was the biggest obstacle in educating people about AIDS, and the largest factor for its spreading.

Also important, he said, was the fact that "people feel abstinence is unrealistic," adding that this "cracks me up."

Harris described several abstinence programs and dating skills that various junior highs and high schools have implemented, noting that the programs problem of homophobia, stressed that the group plans to be "action-oriented."

She said the group will recommend that all students be required to take a "Civility 101" class dealing with homophobia as well as racism.

"My perception is that the Civility 101 class will not just address lesbian, gay and bisexual concerns, but will acquaint students with all differences among the population," Griffen said.

O'Brien attended the task force's first meeting Feb. 4. The group now meets every two weeks. Last September, O'Brien created a multicultural task force but said he was uncertain if it should represent the lesbian, gay and bisexual community.

Griffen said that statistical information gathered from surveys showed alarming harassment of lesbian, gay and bisexual students at the University of Massachusetts. He said this data helped convince O'Brien to form a task force directly assessing the problem, which he described as "big enough to have a whole group of people work on it."

O'Brien chose 18 people representing the diversity of the University population including undergraduates, graduates, administrators and faculty.

Several people selected declined to participate, but the task force has suggested to O'Brien possible replacements, Griffen said.

She said the task force will soon recommend sensitivity training for faculty and graduate students who are teaching assistants.

The task force will also plan for the development of a new lesbian, gay and bisexual center to create a centrally-located, safe haven for students to congregate, achieving a similar role to that of the New Africa House which serves African American students, Griffen said.

Students gain town meeting representation

By TRACY MONAHAN
Collegian Staff

Student victories in recent town elections should help strengthen the student voice in relations with the Amherst town government, several students said.

Senior legal studies major Mike Vallee won a one-year seat as a town meeting member by acquiring six votes in a write-in campaign in voting precinct three.

The town meeting is the legislative body of Amherst that deals with budget issues and bylaws, some of which directly affect students, according to Matt Pavesi, public policy chair of the undergraduate student senate.

Vallee said he is very happy that he won the seat and he said he hopes to change policies that are unfair to students.

"When the time comes to recognize student needs, the town neglects them," Vallee said.

He said he has always wanted to get involved with local politics. He is not affiliated with the SGA.

Vallee said he was too late to run for student government president last year and he was waiting for town elections.

"Three and a half hours before the polling place closed, I decided to run," Vallee said.

Women continue to struggle against 'glass ceiling'

By KRISTEN LANS
Collegian Staff

Alumni, campus employees and students attended a seminar on women in leadership positions and developing methods for success held Wednesday at Mather Career Center.

Ruth Weekes Washington, assistant director of career research at Mather Career Center, and Alicia Smith, a former UMass student employed at the University Childcare Office, discussed politics in the workplace.

Smith said the "glass ceiling" barrier keeps women from leadership positions, citing the banking industry as an example.

"With the glass ceiling you can see the administrative positions, but cannot get there. Those women who are making it to the top are traditionally in dead-end jobs with no other upward movement," Smith said.

Smith said women were originally brought into banking for aesthetic reasons and not allowed to move up beyond a certain point.

"Banking appears to give women equal opportunities. Everyone in banking is a vice president of something," Smith said. "But the people in the top offices remain male."

"With the glass ceiling you can see the administrative positions, but cannot get there. Those women who are making it to the top are traditionally in dead-end jobs with no other upward movement."
-Alicia Smith, University Childcare Office

Another difference between women and men in the workplace, Washington said, is in job interviews.

"Female candidates for the job are asked questions about child care, men are not," Washington said. "A recent example is Zoe Baird."

Baird was recently nominated for Attorney General, but withdrew her application after it was revealed she had hired illegal aliens as babysitters.

Both women spoke, however, of positive signs that the 'Old Boy's' network is changing. Smith said a modern success story can be seen in the White House.

"Bill Clinton has a working wife that has always worked and been a public figure. And he was raised by a single woman," Smith said.

In the past, Smith said, women were caught in the contradictory position of having to decide how much they should be themselves and how many male characteristics they needed to assume.

Laura Chekow, a senior communications major, agreed, saying she came to the seminar because she is graduating into a male-dominated field and wanted to learn tips to enable her to succeed.

"It is important to understand that women are perceived differently on jobs," Chekow said. "But we did not get to the question of how you can be determined without being perceived as a bitch."

Both Smith and Washington stressed the need for students to pick mentors that they can learn from. They said change is happening and women need to push it along by continuously looking for new opportunities and encouraging others.

Washington said, "Part of being a good leader is reaching back and helping another up."

Students discuss experiences in assisting Nicaragua's poor

By TROY MERRICK
Collegian Correspondent

Since the end of Sandinista rule in Nicaragua, conditions have worsened for the general population, as privatization of essentials such as education and medical care have made them harder to get, said a University of Massachusetts graduate and a Hampshire College student.

Kimbal Cartwright, a graduate of UMass and Jennifer Wiegel, a junior at Hampshire College, visited Nicaragua last fall in a program with the Institute for Central American Development Studies in San Jose, Costa Rica, and told of their experiences at the Campus Center last night in a meeting sponsored by AHORA.

We wanted to show an aspect of the land that the media don't show," Wiegel said. "During the Sandinista regime, there were lots of subsidies for crop production, but the revolution brought about a large disappearance of the number of cooperatives that funded these programs along with those of education and medical facilities."

Writing of ordinary people could have literary merit

By TED KOTTLER
Collegian Staff

According to a panel of three British literary scholars, the next time you simply jot down a note, a journal entry, or some ramblings on a piece of scrap paper, you shouldn't think it's significant only to you.

Dorothy Sheridan, an archivist at the University of Sussex, Brian Street, an anthropologist at Sussex and David Barton, a linguist at Lancaster University, stressed in a panel discussion yesterday afternoon that the writing of "ordinary" people carries all the importance of professional writing, and sometimes contains certain information that the writing of authors, scholars and academics cannot reveal.

Barton is the head of The Literacy in the Community Project in Lancaster, England. He said that through extensive interviewing and observation of dozens of adult residents of Lancaster, he has discovered two keys to understanding the literary practices of these individuals.

"The first point to make about literacy is that it's situated," Barton said. "Practices are particular to a particular place. The second point about literacy is that it's particular to individual people."

"I'll give it a whirl and see what happens," she said.

Student Kerry Murphy also won a town meeting member seat out of precinct four.

Rory Pascar, a freshman undecided major, ran a write-in campaign out of precinct two. He received 19 votes, but it was not enough to win a seat.

Amherst Select Board elections were also held Tuesday. Incumbent Carolyn M. Holstein regained her seat with 1,163 votes. Holstein is an Amherst resident and a psychology fellow at the University of Massachusetts.

After four failed attempts, David T. Keenan, an Amherst resident, won a seat on the Select Board with 1,126 votes.

Barton suggested that his research of these particular practices of individuals and communities has enabled him to see that they distinctly craft how and what people write.

"For every person we've talked to, I can pull out something very specific about their literacy practices that actually even surprises me, or is new, or is different. There isn't one way of reading and writing," Barton said.

Sheridan and Street have collaborated with Professor David Bloome of both the University of Massachusetts and the University of Sussex on the Literacy Practices and the Mass-Observation Project (Sussex Project).

The Mass-Observation Archive, founded in 1937, is indeed a massive collection of writings by "ordinary" people from all over Britain about countless subjects. Sheridan endorses compiling these collections because he said he believes ordinary individuals are capable of writing histories equally as valuable as those of professional writers.

tural cooperative, while Cartwright helped street children in Managua. Their stated objectives were to learn about Central America and its environmental crises.

I worked with children who lived and worked in the streets," Cartwright said. "They would spend nearly the whole day cleaning windshields at stoplights and selling tortillas and cigarettes."

He worked with INPRHU (the Institute for Human Promotion) in Managua, trying to incorporate children into the community with activities and substitute homes, necessary because many Nicaraguan children are abused by their families and forced to supply income for their unemployed parents, he said.

Every day, Wiegel said, women faced the question of whether there was going to be work to do in the fields, but they still couldn't hope to compete with cheaper Guatemalan imports.

"Ironically, Nicaraguan growers' and their lifeforce being brought up to scale doesn't seem to be a major concern for the new government," Wiegel said.

They showed slides of the groups they were involved with and some of the projects that they undertook, such as building ovens, irrigating fields and teaching children some of the fundamentals toward becoming more productive and integrated with their communities.

have proven very successful.

The third reason for the rapid spread of the disease, Harris said, is the condom. Harris quoted a Planned Parenthood representative who said, "There is a very serious knowledge vacuum concerning condom reliability, yet we're informing people [that condoms will protect them]."

Harris cited statistics and reports from the New England Journal of Medicine, the Federal Drug Administration, the Center for Disease Control, the surgeon general and top AIDS researchers concerning condom failure, emphasizing the role that spermicides, heat, cold and time play in increasing the likelihood of infection.

Harris said condoms did undergo reliability testing, but questioned the validity of the tests.

"The condom industry set the standard for testing—the FDA just adopted it," he said.

Testing methods are conducted either with water, air or an electric current. Harris pointed out the dangers and unreliability of each test and said new, better testing methods should be implemented, "tests that allow for different variables, like temperature [and] pressure."

Walking along Blind Trail is an eye-opening experience

I don't get cold feet. So when I put my foot through that abandoned ice fishing hole late one wintry night, I was only mildly concerned. We were walking, my neighbor and I, across Puffer's Pond to watch the snow fall in that kind of nighttime brightness that occurs only during a gentle, windless storm. It seemed as though every flake was sparkling in and of itself, creating the combined effect of a clear, full moon.

We continued on across the pond, and over the snow covered road to the trail on the other side.

"Have you ever done the Blind Trail?" she asked, referring to this trail in the woods created for walkers who couldn't see.

"Sure, I've done it a million times. I hike all through here and up to the road and then. . . "

"No. I mean, have you done it blind?"

Had I done it blind? What did she mean — had I done it with my eyes closed? Why would I do that, when I came out here to see in the first place?

"Well, no. I haven't — "

"Close your eyes," she said.

I hesitated a moment, and reached out for the wire that ran along the path. I had seen that wire many times before. I had even touched it. But it felt different now. I took off my left glove so I could feel my way along the wire better, and closed my eyes.

The brightness and beauty of the sparkling woods left me, and I was alone with the sound of my breathing in the darkness.

"Don't cheat," I heard her call from ahead.

I stepped forward, and planted my foot in the new snow. The rocks underneath made the surface uneven, and I pulled on the wire to keep my balance. I stepped again, half wincing at the prospect of being hit in the face or the leg by something protruding out into the trail. I knew nothing was there, but I got that feeling just the same. My fingers tingled as they slid along the plastic-coated wire.

Jeff
MCKENZIE

Suddenly I became aware of the brook running to my right. Its bubbling and splashing had become so clear and distinct as to make me think I was actually walking in it, not to mention my water-logged right shoe, which was squishing and spouting pond water onto the trail.

"What are you thinking about, Jeff?" I heard above the din, "You tell me and then I'll tell you."

"It's loud," I replied, "Everything seems so much louder. And I feel all tingly, like something's about to hit me in the face. What about you?"

I was waiting to hear her say that she thought it was louder too, and that she was having a hard time always keeping her balance. But she didn't say that. Not at all.

"Well," she started, "I'm thinking that maybe you should walk ahead of me — because maybe there's a bad man in the woods and he's waiting behind a tree somewhere — waiting to jump out and grab me. I know it's awful and I wish I wasn't thinking about the bad man, but I can't help it."

"You're thinking about a man in the woods?"

"I know it's awful. I know I should be thinking about something good, like the snow landing on my cheeks or something, but I just can't get it out of my head."

I didn't really know what to say. There I was feeling helpless. But mine was the fun kind of helpless, like the kind you feel on a roller coaster ride at the fair. You get thrown around and you're scared, but then you just get off. It's over.

"I hear the sounds you're hearing too," she went on, "but I think of them differently. It sounds to me like someone is coming up behind me or running through the woods after me. I feel like the bad man might be right there standing in front of me, but I can't see him. I listen for his breathing."

I listened, and I thought I might have heard the bad man in the woods. I stopped and opened my eyes, and I saw her standing there, watching the brook.

It was all over, for me.

Morrissey's Top 11 list

Many of you probably know how cold it was Wednesday night, but me and a friend of mine were walking from Van Meter to Southwest in the sub-zero climate when a knight in shining armor roared down in an Audi.

"Where are you guys headed?" he asked. When we told him Patterson, he said, "hop in." In less time than it takes to say "Good Samaritan," he had us dropped off where he worked, which was College Pizza. The point is, there are some nice people left in the world, so to my pizza delivering friend, I say, "Thanks, and give me a large pizza to go."

Michael
MORRISSEY

For all of those who may not have heard, in the last couple of weeks I took out nomination papers for student government president. No, I wasn't on drugs at the time. I was under the foolish impression that one person, in a watered-down job, could change in one year all of the screw ups that have gone on in recent years.

How foolish of me.

More than one person has came up to me and said, "You're leaving the Collegian for student government?"

The problem is, I really don't think I could fill my predecessor's shoes, and I was also afraid the SGA would pass legislation barring invisible students from the office.

The best thing about being invisible is that you can walk on water.

By the way, I read in the Collegian that Governor Weld doesn't want to raise tuition. Now if can just get our student trustee to feel the same, we'll be getting somewhere.

Doing David Letterman one better, here are the top 11 reasons why I withdrew from the SGA president race.

11. Just wanted to throw a scare in y'all.

10. Fringe benefits of one pair of knee pads (for the imminent brown-nosing to the administration) and an "ALLY" pin just aren't enough.

9. With the Radical Student Union office so close to the SGA office, I'm afraid I'd spend too much time with my professional protesting friends.

8. Would have to go from wearing a suit and tie to UMass hoop games to wearing a conehead.

7. Having a grand old time with the Communists, atheists, alternative lifestyle people and liberals at the Collegian.

6. Aversion to working with anyone with the last name "Hooker."

5. Wanted to assure the University would not get a tuition decrease until the year 2000.

4. During the course of getting nomination papers signed, deceived Van Meter and Brooks residents by saying, "Cannibis Reform Movement. Legalize pot. Sign here."

3. Two words: assassination attempts.

2. Bill Clinton is doing a great job as president. Really. Honestly.

1. Already the most powerful student on campus.

Anti-Semitism is ignored

The imminent foreboding of being attacked racially or culturally is a feeling that many UMass students experience — let alone those that actually do experience an attack, whose numbers are outrageous.

Recently, one more Jewish student, living in the Central residential area, was attacked anti-Semitically.

These feelings of hate exist on campus and unfortunately they're growing strong. This is not the first anti-Semitic attack that has occurred. It is not a strange phenomenon at UMass.

Mimi
FELLNER

Anti-Semitism, as an attitude or belief, and anti-Semitic attacks — whether they take the form of slurs, swastikas or verbal blatancy — have been and are occurring right and left to many Jewish students on campus, and they are repeatedly ignored or hushed up by the administration, or "taken care of" by the campus police. I understand that the school is simply trying to help these students recover. However, the actual impact I have witnessed is that hate towards Jewish students goes beyond the need for material repair of the problem.

Many of these students feel that the actual problem is that anti-Semitism is either not being addressed correctly or awareness is not being sufficiently spread among our tremendously diverse student body. I have heard some UMass students actually say to me that Jewish students have no problems fitting in because the majority of them are White and therefore they have no right to complain. I find this offensive and anti-Semitic in and of itself.

Jewish students who have been attacked should be assured that they are not alone and that the people who are doing these acts of hate will not get away with them. There are many students who are willing to stand up and fight to abolish this form of hate. Let yourself be heard.

If you have in any way been attacked anti-Semitically or know someone who was, don't keep it to yourself — that only makes the problem worse. If it is known, it can increase awareness and help fight the problem. It also shows the assailants that there are concerned students out there and that their cowardly, ignorant actions will stop because the Jewish students will not keep quiet and let it happen.

A Jewish RA matter group is being set up to help increase awareness of the problem and to provide a place for Jewish students to discuss anti-Semitism and other Jewish issues. This is a start; however, it shouldn't stop there when there is still so much to be done and so many people who are hurting.

To cut the deficit, the federal budget must be understood

Most people get their information about the federal budget from the media, which means they get a simplified discussion of the facts. The budget hard to understand, and it's important for people to have the media as a translator. But the media themselves often don't understand how the federal government's revenues are collected and spent, and this causes them to unintentionally mislead people.

The federal government uses what it calls the unified budget to account for its activities, but this budget actually is divided into two fund groups: federal funds and trust funds. All income taxes, corporate and personal, are paid into the federal funds. Trust funds receive their revenue in three different ways. Least important are excise taxes and user fees, levied on specific items like gasoline. Then there are receipts from federal funds payments into trust funds and social insurance taxes.

Unlike federal funds money, trust funds revenues are earmarked by law for specific purposes. The vast majority of money spent on what are commonly called entitlements is spent out of trust funds accounts, and most of that spending is self-financed through social insurance taxes. In fact, the trust funds group as a whole ran a surplus of $96 billion in 1992, while the federal funds group ran a deficit of $386 billion the same year.

Jonah
GELBACH

The media usually report that "the federal deficit" for 1992 was about $300 billion, using the unified budget figure, which is designed to show the total amount of money spent by all federal programs, including both the federal and trust funds groups. By law, any surplus funds in the trust funds accounts must be used to buy debt issued by the Treasury; as a result, every penny of the trust funds surplus was used to buy federal funds debt. The government subtracts this from the deficit figure; hence the $300 billion figure.

The distinction between the two funds groups is important for two reasons. First, taking the unified budget figures for granted obscures the source of the problem. The cause lies on the federal, not trust, funds side, where huge sums of money are paid out each year for military spending and interest payments. Health costs are also mushrooming in the federal funds group.

The second reason has to do with fixing the problem: we can only deal effectively with the budget crisis if we understand which measures will help. Since the federal funds group is causing the problem, we must focus on its deficit, not the unified deficit. For example, increased gas taxes mean the trust funds will run a larger surplus and can purchase more debt. But this would only refinance — not lower — the deficit, since the federal funds would still be spending the same amount.

In reducing the federal funds deficit, we have to realize one reality. While we can cut defense or domestic spending or raise taxes, we cannot cut interest payments. This is the travesty of the last 12 years: economic growth was financed by government debt, severely restricting our capacity to invest in the future and pay for needed government services.

To reduce the deficit we must cut military spending radically. Military-related spending for 1991 amounts to over $330 billion, more than 45 percent of all non-interest federal funds spending. Health care reform is also urgent: in 1992, the federal funds spent $75.5 billion for Medicaid and paid $40 billion into the trust funds for Medicare.

The fact is, we got into this mess through 12 years of fiscal policy that couldn't have hurt us more if it had been designed to, and it will take decades to repair the damage. We cannot deal with the problem on the spending side alone — new revenues will be required. Since they benefited from the last two administrations' tax policies, the wealthy must bear the brunt of the cleanup. President Clinton's decision to raise the top tax bracket to 36 percent is a start, but it is only that.

Jonah Gelbach is a UMass student who works as a federal budget analyst at National Priorities Project in Northampton.

Spotlight on: The Canine Bastards

Cutter converses with the cool, cracked and quirky musical up and comers

By CUTTER GARCIA
Collegian Staff

Cutter Garcia: Introduce yourselves to us.

Canine Bastards: Butterfly Styles - Lead Vocals, Peter Bones - Bass, G.P. (pronounced "jeep") Bogus - Drums, Joe Man - Guitars and Sharky Favorite - Keyboards and Vocals.

CG: Why the stage names?

CB: It's an ongoing thing to add some allure and excitement to the show. We're going for that gimmicky thing.

CG: How long have the Bastards been together?

CB: Four years. We all went to St. John's prep. together in Boston, except for Bones. Bones went to Andover High, he's the public-school boy, and we all hooked up during our jr. year. Then we came to UMass.

CG: Was that a planned thing — coming to the same college?

CB: Yeah, we did it for the band.

CG: How did you get a name like, The Canine Bastards?

CB: Shhh! We'll never tell! It's a long, dark tale.

CG: Are all of you still students here at UMass?

CB: Three of us are. Sharky Fave, Butterfly and Bones. Joe Man is a copier, he makes copies at some office building. And we have no idea what G.P. is doing. G.P. just "is."

CG: Define the Canine Bastards' music for us.

CB: It's a lot of different styles, a humorous edge and a zest for life all combined into one big package.

CG: Be more specific. If we were in a record store — what rack would the Bastards stuff be found in?

CB: Toss Elvis Presley, The Dead Milkmen, Keith Richards, The Pixies and Black Frances into a blender and whatever'd pop out — that's where we'd be.

CG: Who does most of the writing?

CB: It's pretty well mixed up. We've all written tunes together. A typical song is written with two of us sitting down together with a tape recorder or a 4-Trac, maybe we're having a few beers, somebody's got lyrics or a tune or maybe it just comes straight off of the top of your head. We pretty much just work it out and let it happen.

CG: That's cool. What are your plans for this semester?

CB: We're still going to be gigging a lot of local parties but our big thing is the Battle of the Bands in the Blue Wall coming up March 30. The U.P.C. [Union Program Council] has set up this competition thing where five bands will be playing and the winner will get to open up the spring Pond Concert. It's gonna be huge.

CG: Are all of the bands UMass bands?

CB: No. Two are Hampshire bands, two are UMass bands and one is a NoHo band.

CG: Who's your UMass competition?

CB: A band called Mongami. They're pretty good.

CG: Are you going to tour at all?

CB: Yeah, we are. We're going to Middlebury College in Connecticut to do a little mini-tour. OK, it's not a tour-tour, it's a stop tour. It's a trip. They're paying for all, so that's pretty cool. We're gonna get a van and a quarter barrel and it's going to be cool. It's a pretty huge production. They don't get a lot of out of town bands out there so it's a pretty big deal for them.

CG: You guys also play and have played some pretty big spots in Boston — right?

CB: Yeah. Probably our most famous gig was at Fort Apache recording studios in Boston last year. It was a big New Year's Eve bash. Joe Jack Talcum, from The Dead Milkmen, played guitar with us at that show. We've also played at The Channel and The Ratt. We'll be playing Bunratty's in March and we also play a lot at The Middle Eastern Cafe in Cambridge. That's probably our home base.

CG: That's a long way to travel to gig. Why not play more clubs in this area?

CB: It's tough to get gigs out here. In Boston it's really easy. They're more susceptible to different styles in Boston. But out here places like Pearl Street and The Vertex really aren't into it. They just want to hear bands like Bongo to Circus all the time. It seems like all they care about is turn out and immediate name recognition.

CG: Well, why should we care about

Variety show boasts huge cast of performers

By LISA CURTIS
Collegian Staff

Where is the only other location, besides Mullins Center, where you can listen to those melodious cheerleaders, the UMass Hoop Band members? Where can you see the individual snare drum champion, UMass student Nick Angelis? The location: The Really Big Show at the Academy of Music Theater in Northampton this Sunday.

The Really Big Show is the ultimate quirky variety show, according to the Northampton Arts Council, which is producing this show, the last of a series entitled Four Sundays in February.

The cast of characters will come together in the old Ed Sullivan Show format, with two-time Academy Award nominee Larry Hott, documentary filmmaker of Florentine Film fame, serving as emcee.

Providing music throughout the show will be the UMass Basketball Hoop Band in the Academy's pit. Also performing from UMass will be the A Cafellas, a six-man jazz/pop a cappella group and Nick Angelis, the current Drum Core International Individual Snare Drum Champion.

Pulitzer Prize winning author Tracy Kidder will read from one of his works. Leslea Newman, author of "Heather Has Two Mommies," will read her poetry.

Peter Lobdell, the resident artist in the department of theater and dance at Amherst College will dazzle you with marionettes while Katherine Sanderson & Co. will present "Tableaux Vivants de la Mort."

Julio Pena, renowned Puerto Rican dancer, will perform Karitomo, a modern Afro-Caribbean dance, with dancers Tracy Smith and Gretchen Young and percussionist Brandon Merger.

The icing on the cake has to be 81-year-old accordion player Helene Criscio, performing duets with her partner Susan Burris. And according to the Arts Council, another musician, 13-year-old saxophonist Toby Johnson, "puts our new President to shame."

The Arts Council is also planning to award Norinne Tiley its annual Dynamic Impact Award for the many years of service she gave to the Northampton High School music department before her retirement this year.

There will also be a narrated slide show of the works of 20 local craft and visual artists.

Tickets for The Really Big Show are $5 for all seats and may be purchased at Bird's Store in Florence; Guild Art Centre and State Street Fruit Store in Northampton; For the Record in Amherst; and World Eye Bookstore in Greenfield. The show begins at 2 p.m. on Sunday, Feb. 28.

Inside a Vat 'O Fun with The Scrubbing Bubbles

By SUSAN R. BARRINGTON
Collegian Correspondent

The Scrubbing Bubbles claim their music was best described by a person in a record store as "Devo meets The Residents on Sesame Street." I'm sure anyone who's ever heard their first album, Vat 'O Fun is wondering "what inspired, or possessed them, to do this?" Well, I had the pleasure of interviewing the two minds between the madness...

The legacy of the Scrubbing Bubbles began when two guys from UMass locked themselves into a dorm room with some synthesizers, a cheap vo-coder (voice modifier), a Fisher Price xylophone, and various other noisemakers. They recorded a tape of songs for a friend's birthday. The person who received the tape called it "The Acme of all Creation." One year later, they compiled a new tape and sold it at a local record store.

"By some modern miracle," said Scrubbing Bubble #2, "this tape of vaguely musical stuff took off and became #1 in The Advocate for five weeks."

"We still don't know why."

Unfortunately, I cannot reveal the names of The Scrubbing Bubbles. They wish to remain anonymous, so as to avoid lawsuits and death threats. If you listen to the tape you'll know why.

"We heard that one guy actually said 'If I ever find out who recorded this I'm gonna beat the #@$% out of them.'"

Among their many influences are "this guy in Harvard Square who plays the accordion. He'll play any They Might Be Giants song. He's our newest biggest influence. We met him yesterday. Before that...Devo. They're our biggest influence as far as ripping off material. Peter Paul and Mary, The Electric Company...we're influenced by everything."

The duo has a talent for bringing out the bizarre side in the songs that they cover. Their covers include a very off-key version of a childhood favorite, "Silent E" by Tom Lehrer, a mutated version of "Speed Racer" by Devo and an interesting adaptation of "Rain" by the Beatles.

"How much of it did Lennon and McCartney actually write?" I asked.

"The chord progressions were written by Lennon and McCartney, and we did put in a kind of messed-up version of the melody right in the middle."

"But the lyrics?"

"Absolutely not."

"Lennon, while he thought he was bigger than Jesus, I don't think he really put much thought into 'peeling cats.'"

When I asked how much of their work was autobiographical, they quickly said: "All of it."

"Metaphorically."

They claim they did not try to target a specific audience, but rather, their audience targeted them.

"We try our best to just irritate as many people as we possibly can."

"It was sort of a shock when people actually liked our album."

"We feel if one person listens to our tape and says 'what the [expletive] is this?!' and throws it out the window, we will have accomplished our goal."

"One person actually threw our tape into the wood stove."

"We were very honored."

The Scrubbing Bubbles are currently working on their second album, We Enjoy Being A Lunatic.

Real album of the year

Check your head gives B Boys the crown

By CALEB COCHRAN
Collegian Staff

In keeping with the spirit of Wednesday night's Grammy Awards, I present to you, Collegian readers, my Album of the Year.

First off, let me acknowledge the runners up: The Black Crowes' Southern Harmony & Musical Companion, R.E.M.'s Automatic for the People, Tracy Chapman's Matters of the Heart, and the Spin Doctors' Pocket Full of Kryptonite.

The winner is the Beastie Boys' *Check Your Head. A sterling collection of rap at its most ferocious, this one won by a landslide.

Although not nearly as well received by the public as Licensed to Ill, this album includes some of the Beastie Boys' best work, especially "3-Minute Rule," "Looking Down the Barrel of a Gun," and "The Sounds of Science." "B-Boy Bouillabaisse" includes some hints of what's to come on the next album.

Which brings us to 1992 and the release of Check Your Head. This is by far the most creative album the Boys have released, as well as the most diverse. The 20 selections range from the psychedelic "Something's Got to Give," to the powerful "So What'cha Want," to the frenzied "Time for Livin'."

The three man Brooklyn-based band also played all off their own instruments on Check Your Head, something they had not done on the first two albums. The result is a much more balanced attack.

When the Beastie Boys turn to the mic, they rap harder and with more determination than ever before. "Pass the Mic" is a pretty conventional rap tune, but the vigor that flows from the mouths of MCA, Mike D. and Adrock is anything but conventional. When MCA says, "I'm mowin' down MC's like I'm mowin' the lawn," the listener can do nothing but agree.

"Finger Lickin' Good," "Stand Together," "The Maestro" and "Professor Booty" are all rapped and played with an insane amount of energy and life. The Beastie Boys hold nothing back on this album, and it pays off. The feelings of spontaneity and creative rage that flow throughout the album make listening to it an inspirational experience.

Check Your Head may not have won the Grammy this year, but it won respect for the Beastie Boys as legitimate musicians as well as creative rap artists. So to Michael (Mike D) Diamond, Adam (Adrock) Horowitz and Adam (MCA) Yauch, I congratulate you as the winners of my Album of the Year. Your trophy's in the mail.

hearing The Bastards?

CB: Because we like to entertain. We like to make sure that people are enjoying themselves when they come to see us. For every gig we do, we play a different set according to whatever kind of an audience we have. Unlike some bands that are just out there for themselves — we're out there as a group. We just want everybody to have a good time. Your five bucks will be worth it.

CG: Where will The Canine Bastards be five years from now?

CB: Hopefully we'll be travelling around the world and playing to every sort of crowd in every kind of arena around the planet. We have high aspirations for the future.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): New projects will flourish — especially those designed to improve your home life. Try to settle your debts with friends, but put an old disappointment out of your mind.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): It pays to consult a trusted friend or associate about proposed financial moves and pivotal changes. This person's grasp of the facts could really open your eyes.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): You gain greater influence today. The path is open for you to contact people in high places. See yourself as a responsible leader in the community and do your duty.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Money tends to slip through the cracks now. Pay your debts but do not let other people's impractical ways cost you. The mark of a winner is one whose house is in order.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Move into high gear. Seize a unique opportunity to advance your career or financial goals. Keeping in close touch with overseas contacts will help you.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Positive momentum returns; conditions are right for you to work in harmony with other people. Treat your co-workers like family and they will stand by you.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): A secret wish involving your domestic work could come true. Heed your intuition and tackle a rough job with renewed determination. Perform a service for your community.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Take stock of where things stand. Someone who has been trying to pull the wool over your eyes reveals his true nature. Romantic obsessions when least expected.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 12): Any misunderstandings that arose now could linger, so be precise. You win the day by staying out of the storm. Try to postpone crucial negotiations until next week.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Powerful, inspiring forces allow you to tap home, work and financial resources. Intuition and careful planning guide you unfailingly to your objective.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Your efforts to keep your ideals and practices in alignment win widespread appreciation. Help a neighbor who is ill or in need of encouragement.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): You can help someone you love come to grips with a tough problem. Shared interests lead to blissful romance. Use quiet diplomacy to win important points with teenagers.

The fans would stuff the ballot boxes for the starting lineups, and the coach with the second-best record in each league would field the rest of the eight-man team, along with completing his duties on the bench. Eight-man team, you ask? Sure, they are young, and look what Shaq said when Riley rested him for a huge chunk of this past Game.

I know I can't represent the broad fan base of the NBA, so here is how I would fill out the ballots.

In the West, I would start Anthony Peeler (Lakers) and Latrell Sprewell (Warriors) in the backcourt along with Richard Dumas (Suns), Robert Horry (Rockets), and Christian Laettner (Wolves) up front.

For the East, Lee Mayberry (Bucks) and Harold Miner (Heat) at the guards, with Todd Day (Bucks), Clarence Weatherspoon (Sixers) and Alonzo Mourning (Hornets) up front.

The coaches: John Lucas of San Antonio and Phil Jackson of the Bulls. Oh, there were other rooks who deserved to be in this game – like LaPhonso Ellis (Nuggets), Tom Gugliotta (Bullets), Walt Williams (Kings), Sean Rooks (Mavericks, don't laugh) and Anthony Avent (Bucks) – but I'll leave these appointments to the coaches.

Prediction: It would be a close game, with the depth on the side of the West prevailing, 81-76. MVP: Richard Dumas. Just a hunch. Anyway, it's my game, and he's my favorite on the winning West squad. How do you think Stockton and Malone got co-MVP?

Draft not too far away: UMass senior Harper Williams is indeed one of these players that has a shot at the Pros. Williams has a deadly hook in the paint that you can't defend, and he has the mentality of a pro.

I'll save more on Harper for the Draft Preview coming up at the end of the Madness.

Well, the second half of the season started off with a bang on Monday as the Sonics acquired Sam Perkins for two guys that don't even play for them: Doug Christie and Benoit Benjamin.

Seattle has a potent lineup (Kemp, McKey, Cage, Pierce, E. Johnson, Barros, Payton, and now Perkins) to go after the teams ahead of them, like Phoenix and San Antonio, and keep it interesting.

The Nets have started out slowly in the second half, but I still say that they are the fourth-best team in the East. A surprise team that you should look out for is Charlotte. The Hornets are keeping very quiet in the Central, and could shock some people.

Next week, I'll give my predictions on how I think the second half will go.

Did you see that?

- Harold Miner's sick Dominique-like slam against the mediocre competition last Saturday.
- Hugo the Hornet's even sicker dunk, dubbed "Bug on the Windshield," in the Mascot slam contest.
- Phoenix's 105-103 win in San Antonio on Tuesday.
- The Magic sweeping the season series against the dying Blazers. Pre-Shaq era — Portland 8, Orlando 0.
- Terry Porter's choke in the shootout when he missed the last six shots, only needing to hit one to tie and two to win.
- Everyone that I know rooting for Porter to choke and Price to win.

Men try to wrap up A-10 title Saturday

CHRISTOPHER EVANS / COLLEGIAN

The University of Massachusetts men's basketball team will try to shock the league by winning their second consecutive A-10 regular season title Saturday.

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

The game that was penciled in early in the season as a battle between the top two teams in the Atlantic 10 has finally arrived. Ho hum.

Instead of being the contest that decides which team, West Virginia or Massachusetts, wins the regular season title, it is just another road game for the Minutemen. When they tipoff Saturday at noon in WVU Coliseum, UMass will be facing the second worst, not second best, team in the conference.

The question lingers, what has happened to the Mountaineers, who were touted as an NCAA-caliber team in November and were selected in first place in the pre-season coaches' poll.

Instead of battling the Minutemen for the first seed in the A-10 Tournament, this West Virginia squad has staggered to a 13-10 record, and a 4-7 showing in the A-10.

The Mountaineers have been abysmal on the road, going 0-9 thus far. They are playing well at home, with a 13-1 record. Their only defeat was a four-point loss to Big East member Pittsburgh. Still, a team with high hopes at the start of the 1992-93 campaign is now hoping for an NIT berth.

Center Wilfred Kirkaldy and forward Lawrence Pollard were both seriously injured in a car accident last May, and Kirkaldy is still trying to walk again. Needless to say, losing these players has affected the Mountaineers on and off the court.

The players who are suited up are not producing, however. Junior Ricky Robinson is struggling despite leading the team in scoring. Jeremy Bodkin and Matt Roadcap have combined for only seven rebounds per game, and point guard Marsalis Basey must also carry the load on offense, as he is third on the team in scoring.

The Minutemen can clinch the Atlantic 10 regular season title with a win over the Mountaineers Saturday, winning back-to-back titles for the first time since Temple did it from 1986-88.

UMass has won two years straight in the Coliseum, including last year's 74-69 OT thriller. The Coliseum was dubbed in 1991 by SPORT magazine as one of the 10 toughest places to play in the country. With 14,000 raucous fans and a mascot who fires a shotgun, a trip to the Coal Mine State is never a pleasant experience. Assistant John Robic said he expects another battle.

"It's tough to play there, they're a very good home team," Robic said. "This game's been sold out for 10 days, and there's 14,000 tickets. What's nice about it is their students are right down on top of you like at the Cage or the Mullins."

Head coach John Calipari has been working the Minutemen relentlessly, calling closed practices for the past three nights, something that has never happened before in the Calipari era. Speculation is that the team is training as much in endurance and calesthenics as in zone defense and half-court offense.

Game Notes: The game, as always, can be heard on WMUA 91.1 FM with Brian Jones and Dave T. Ohldread and on WHMP 99.3 FM with Howie Davis and George Miller, and seen on Channel 22.

Men host Syracuse

By ANDREW BRYCE
Collegian Staff

If there is a gymnastics meet to see this year, tomorrow's meet is the one, as the University of Massachusetts men's team hosts powerhouse Syracuse University at Boyden Gym at 1 p.m.

The Orangemen come into Amherst as the No. 5 team in the country, their highest ranking in thirty years. Syracuse is led by Ofri Parot, ranked first in the nation on the vault, and Jason Hebert, the 1992 national vaulting champion. Johnson says that both are capable of scoring a 9.80.

"I think their capability of scoring 9.80 shows how good they really are," said Johnson. "Jason Braud or Jason Lee could take third place, or if [Parot and Hebert] have a bad day, they could take second and third."

"How many teams ranked fifth in the nation come to UMass? This is going to be a great show. Syracuse has made a strong commitment to gymnastics, and it has payed off," Johnson said.

On Wednesday night, UMass visited Southern Connecticut and defeated them 247.55-238.85. The Minutemen once again won every event but the high bar. Co-captain Jay Santos was the lone bright spot on the high bar as he registered UMass' first score over 8.00 (8.10) this season.

Senior co-captain Steve Christensen once again broke his own pommel horse record as he scored a 9.75, breaking his mark of 9.70 set last weekend against Army. National rankings that came out Wednesday listed Christensen as being ranked fifth on the pommel horse, so his performance against Southern Connecticut should maintain his ranking.

Christensen also scored a season high of 9.00 on the parallel bars, leading the Minutemen to a team high score for this season (43.65). Johnson noted that Christensen added a new skill to his routine, which could propel him into the national rankings in this event.

Jason Braud took second in this event, with Santos and Steve Goldman tying for third. Goldman's 8.75 was his highest score of the season.

Braud won the floor exercise with a score of 9.55, his highest score in an away meet. This could help him move into the national rankings, namely the top twenty. Christensen finished second on the floor.

Other Minutemen who scored in Wednesday's meet were Stu Backer, who finished first on the rings, and Santos, whose high bar performance was good enough for second place.

Women's gym rolls on, to face rival Wildcats

By ARTHUR STAPLETON
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's gymnastics team travels to New Hampshire this weekend for a meet with the Wildcats, looking to increase its possibilities for a spot in the NCAA Regionals, held at Ohio State University in early April.

Head coach Alfie Mitchell and his Minutewomen are coming off a costly victory over Springfield College, 184.80-180.65 on Wednesday night at Blake Arena in Springfield. UMass senior Tammy Marshall was injured during the vault, her first event of the night.

Marshall landed straight-legged on her dismount from the vault, jamming her knee, and preventing her from continuing in the meet. She received a 9.40 for the event, but the injury could have darkened the mood of the Minutewomen, according to Mitchell.

It did not, however, as UMass stepped it up a notch behind junior Margaret Furtado, whose performances on vault (9.20), bars (9.60), beam (9.50) and floor (9.55) won her the all-around.

Mitchell was impressed with Furtado's performance, especially on bars. Throughout the night, according to Mitchell, the scores did not do the performances justice.

"Margaret just had a great routine. She nailed it, it was nice. But, once again, the score didn't reflect how impressive it was," said Mitchell.

This Saturday's encounter with rival UNH (5-7) should be a close battle of two teams heading toward the Regionals, according to Mitchell.

The Wildcats are led by all-arounder Karen Olsson, who scored a season high 38.55 in their meet with northeastern powerhouse Penn State University. Olsson has scored highest for UNH thus far this season on bars (9.80), beam (9.70), and floor (9.80).

For the vault, UNH is led by Kim Smith, who scored a 9.75 earlier this season, which is the team's best. The Wildcats' highest score this season is 189.90, compared to a 189.65 for UMass.

Mitchell knows that it will be a war, whether or not his star Marshall would be able to go. As of press time, it was doubtful that Marshall would compete, but the injury was not serious. If not Saturday, she will be back for next week's Bulldog Invitational at the University of Georgia.

"We always have a way of beating them [two out of three times last season], but this year they want to win. It should be fun," said Mitchell.

Women's track preps for A-10s

By JASON NASH
Collegian Staff

After posting a mediocre regular season and then tying for second at the Atlantic 10 Championships, the University of Massachusetts women's track team goes to work tonight on the campus of the University of Rhode Island in the New England Championships.

While UMass carries the smallest team of all its competitors, head coach Julie LaFreniere said she was extremely positive about the chances of her team.

"We have quality, not quantity," said LaFreniere. "Still, I'm very optimistic about all our women competing."

And rightfully she should, for LaFreniere's troops are some of the best athletes this school has ever seen, as her squad contains women that have broken four school records. Moreover, UMass is well-rounded in most areas and guaranteed to make some waves in the smallest state in the nation.

In the relays, UMass boasts one of the finest four by eight teams in the nation with Kerry Aker, Kelly Liljeblad, Kim Liljeblad and Becky Johnson, and according to LaFreniere has a great shot at breaking the school record.

The quartet qualified for the ECAC Championship last Friday night and seems to be coming into full form despite the flu hitting their team all season long. Aker, who is only a sophomore, has been sick with the flu, but is still running in the meet.

"Kerry's tough," said relay-mate Kelly Liljeblad. "Even if she's not 100 percent healthy, I know she'll give 100 percent."

In other running areas, UMass looks strong in the 3000 meter with Kelly Liljeblad and in the 1000 meter with Johnson. With both athletes doubling up in events, fatigue is always a concern, especially with the fact that Johnson has been fighting a flu of her own.

"Lots of kids have gotten this sickness all year long and often it goes away and hits them again," said LaFreniere. "Becky feels sick in the morning and night, but okay in the day. Hopefully, she'll be okay."

Another area UMass excels in is throwing, with Diane Ozzolek competing in the 20-pound weight and Natalie Hart in the shot-put. Both hold the school record in these events, with Hart breaking the shot-put record in her first throw of the season.

"Natalie broke the record at the A-10's and we hope to see her explode this weekend," LaFreniere said.

In the triple jump, UMass has another strong hope in sophomore Janey Meeks, who owns the school record at almost 40 feet. With her youth comes the possibility of overzealousness becoming a handicap.

"I'm a little nervous, but my legs feel really good," said Meeks. "I've been lucky not to get hit with the flu that's going around."

Rookie game – great NBA idea

Over the last few weeks, this space has been dedicated to the 1993 NBA All-Star Weekend, especially the Game itself. While sitting in a crowded room watching the three-point shootout and the Gatorade Slam Dunk championship, as usual, some ideas raced into my head.

I've realized, like many others, that David Stern and the other basketball gods need to find a replacement for the Legends game. Well, if you haven't guessed by now, this columnist has one — the Rookie game, sponsored by the Notes from the Hardwood.

Yes, I know that some people have already suggested it, but I have the teams, so here goes nothing.

First of all, let me state the one stipulation on being in the Jr. Game: if you are playing in the Big Game, you are not eligible for this one. So sorry Shaq, you'll have to wait 'til Sunday.

Steinem calls for abolishing of patriarchy

By MICHELLE BAYLISS
Collegian Staff

One of America's best-known feminists, Gloria Steinem, said everyone together can put an end to the system of hierarchy and patriarchy which has undermined people's self-authority, during an informal talk on her new book, Revolution From Within, Saturday night at Mt. Holyoke College.

"Let's declare [the hierarchy] an experiment. It failed and it's over. If we are going to go into a new era, we have to fight together," said Steinem. "Feminism isn't successful without overturning racism, classism . . . we must support all of our rights."

Steinem said she was pleased to be an excuse to bring the "most envied crowd in the world and most creative trouble makers" together. She reciprocated the warm welcome, applauding the standing room only audience of about 1,500 and invited members of the energetic crowd to sit with her on stage.

Concerned that people don't realize the concept of "personal is political," Steinem compared former President Ronald Reagan and President Bill Clinton to illuminate the "tragedy" of society being only comprised of conquerors and the conquered.

She contrasted the manner in which both Reagan and Clinton both coped with violent alcoholic fathers and the impact it had on the country. She said

Steinem inspires people to seek self-authority

By MICHELLE BAYLISS
Collegian Staff

People came from all over to hear Gloria Steinem discuss her latest book, Revolution From Within: A Book of Self-Esteem, which many said inspired them to change their lives. Hundreds lined up to have the book signed.

"This book has changed my life," said Nancy Duggan, a student from Mt. Holyoke College. "She gives me self-authority and validates the rage and anger that is so invalidated by society."

"She's wonderful. She gives me the right to be who I want to be," said Clare Garrity, who travelled from Hingham, MA to hear Steinem speak. "She's been a really big influence on my life. She's very empowering."

Gail Hornstein, the Chair of the Women's Studies Department at Mt. Holyoke College, said the fact

Activism in the 1990s

Davis says today's activism must be based on past

By STACY MALONE
Collegian Staff

"Activism into the '90s, where to now?" As a veteran of political activism for 38 years, Angela Davis says we must look back to step progressively into the future.

Davis spoke in Bowker Auditorium last Friday night to a standing room only crowd. Her lecture was sponsored by the Distinguished Visitors Program.

"Legacies of struggle are important to talk about," Davis said. "We must recognize that it is possible to envision new ways of activism while nuturing the legacies of history."

Angela Davis' history of political activism within the movements for women's rights and racial equality has established her as a member of both the Black Panthers and Communist Party, U.S.A. She is now a Professor of History of Consciousness at the University of California, Santa Cruz and lecturers all over the world.

"Sometimes those of us who are veterans of historical activism often look to the roots of the past," Davis said, "but we need to take account the changed consciousness around us."

Davis said her role as a veteran activist is not to map the future direction of activism, because movements rarely unfold so they can be seen.

She said that the 1960s have been elevated to a level of ideal activism, but the contagious activism of the '60s wasn't really predicted. Davis also said that the activists of the '60s were just as reluctant to make sacrifices as the activists now.

"As a young militant activist I stood next to Malocom X and against Dr. King," Davis said, "because I figured why integrated into a sinking ship."

Davis said that the work evoked using the symbol of Dr. King was very important, but the people at the roots of the political movements are anonymous and most of the anonymous faces were women's.

Davis said that people don't know how to acknowledge those who played important roles in the founding of activism so they chose people such as Dr. King and Malcolm X and elevate them to the status of icons.

Davis said that we think of the civil rights movement beginning with Rosa Parks being too tired to move the back of the bus and that's how we perceive women in the civil rights movement.

"The only kind of tired Rosa Parks was, was tired of segregation," Davis said.

Davis said that growing up in Birmingham, Alabama she did not have a sense of anyone else other than black and white categories and it is interesting how new racial categories have emerged.

"Race itself has developed from a racist world and the whole notion of race needs to be rethought," Davis said. "There are endless debates about who counts as black and who doesn't. I am a black woman, but I don't have to take on certain characteristics to be a black woman," Davis said.

"A metaphor that is often used to describe the U.S. is the melting pot," Davis said. "Everyone jumps in the pot and are melted down into one thing which is white and male."

SETH KAYE / COLLEGIAN
Angela Y. Davis spoke to a standing room only crowd Friday night at Bowker Auditorium.

Davis said the new metaphor is the salad where everyone can be themselves.

"Isn't it interesting the new metaphor is something that can be consumed?" Davis said. "I want to know who gets to eat that salad."

Davis said that the new administration symbolizes a new era, but she did not celebrate Clinton's victory rather the end of the Reagan/Bush era which makes the possibility of a new activist era.

"There is an embodiment of the desires of many people to move in a progressive direction, but we will be in for some misconceptions if we invest all our hopes in one man," Davis said.

Davis said for this new activist-era, activism cannot be done the old way. She said that national strategies concerning jobs, drugs and prison reform must be developed and people of color need to learn how to build alliances across ethnic groups.

Davis said, "Take serious note of how far we have come, but we have not reached the mountain top."

Burst pipe floods FAC; Causes minimal damage

By FRANCIS ZERA

A burst water pipe caused the flooding of several floors on the east end of the Fine Arts Center early Friday morning.

The flood was reported to the Physical Plant at approximately 5:00 a.m. Friday's below zero temperatures caused a heating unit located on an outside wall to freeze, resulting in the leak.

When Physical Plant staff arrived, they located the leak in room 365, but the door was locked and no keys were available. Plumbers had to use chisels to remove the doorknob to gain access.

The water, ankle-deep in places, flowed down three floors, passed through the music library and ended up in the electronic music studio and dressing rooms.

According to University spokesperson Karin Sherbin, initial damage was minimal, being confined to minor damage to a grand piano in Bezanson Recital Hall and several recordings in the music library. An organ was also damaged, but no estimate is yet available, Sherbin said.

A dramatic moment came later in the morning when water reached a live power cable, tripping circuit breakers and extinguishing lights with a series of loud popping sounds, witnesses said.

The water was pumped directly outdoors down an entrance ramp, and a dense fog resulted from the warm water hitting the cold morning air.

Billowing from the east entrance, it hindered vision and complicated the clean-up effort. Fans were in place to aid the dispersal of the fog. Dozens of Physical Plant employees participated in the clean-up.

Sherbin said that Bezanson Hall was cleaned up and opened in time for student recitals.

Speakers discuss AIDS

By KRISTEN LANS

Women worldwide are unable to protect themselves against HIV because of the power structure which renders women economically and physically powerless, according to speakers at a seminar Saturday, titled Women and AIDS.

Quynh Dang, HIV/Health and Outreach Educator with the Multicultural AIDS Coalition in Boston, addressed the international AIDS situation. Sara Dubik-Unruh, Director of AIDS Programs from Lowell House focused on the impact of AIDS on women in the U.S.

Dang said women are disposable in the Third World and U.S. military men contribute to their oppression by using women near foreign bases as sex workers.

"In the Phillipines five out of six women who are HIV infected are hospitality workers near the naval base", Dang said.

Dang related past action taken against women with sexually transmitted diseases to present action against women with HIV.

"In World War II the reaction to the worldwide epidemic of syphilis was to quarantine 30,000 women instead of giving condoms to military men", Dang said. "The U.S. has banned the immigration of HIV infected people and as a result two hundred people are currently quarintined at Guantonimo Bay."

Both Dang and Dubik-Unruh questioned why military men are not punished along with the women they infect.

Dubik-Unruh said women are considered vectors of HIV to men and vessels of HIV to babies, but not victims themselves. She stressed the futility of this view because women are not efficient transmitters of HIV but are extremely vulnerable to it.

According to Dang, women are in no position to ask "Johns" to use condoms and if they could, a condom would cost them two-thirds of amount paid for the sex act. Dang also said an international sex trade has been established with Third World women becoming victims to First World demand.

"Sex workers form a vital part of the Third World economy", Dang said. "In Haiti the sex trade is second largest source of foreign currency."

Both Dang and Dubik-Unruh said that those who do the research on AIDS control the information output, to the loss of women and people of color.

Dang said the First World controls AIDS research funds and consequently the blame for the virus and its spread has been placed on the Third World and people of color.

Dubik-Unruh also sees the blame-game going on in the U.S. as a result of the previously defined risk groups by the Center for Disease Control during the early years of the epidemic.

"The risk groups are a way of government saying nice people like us don't get infected", Dubik-Unruh said. "The government would choke if they had to say anal sex between anyone is a risk behavior instead of gay men as a risk group."

Dubik-Unruh said research funds are concentrated on how women effect male partners and babies born to them.

"The CDC has done one study on women up to this point and you will never hear about it because the researchers didn't find what they thought they would," Dubik-Unruh said.

The study tested the transmittal rate of HIV positive prostitutes to customers. They could not document one case of this transmission from female to male, Dubik-Unruh said.

She used biology to explain why women are twenty times more likely to be infected by a man than a man by a woman.

Dubik-Unruh wants to see research directed to new prophylactic devices that women can use without needing a mans consent or knowledge, citing one in ten men in the U.S. are HIV positive.

She added, "We need to protect ourselves because we are worth it."

Reagan concealed his shame and denied having an alcoholic father.

"Reagan became the king of denial," said Steinem. "He took the whole [expletive] country into denial. . . he denied racism, poverty, homelessness, hunger . . ."

Because Clinton on the other hand was able to cope more realistically, Steinem said, he is more capable than Reagan.

"We finally have a president who actually listens and empathizes," said Steinem. "And that's all we can ask for. We have to do the rest. But we need someone who at least listens."

Steinem said she was happy to see Hillary Clinton in the news. She said editors give Hillary a lot of "flak" because they are so threatened by the fact that she has an equal 50/50 relationship with her husband. "Taxpayers should be happy they're getting two for the price of one," she added.

Steinem emphasized that childhood is the most neglected factor in society today and said if she could stand in the snow and hold up one sign it would read "the only form of arms is how we raise our children."

She said she would want two people standing next to her holding up signs that read "no she is not a childhood determinist" and "I'm not only talking to women."

She said women learn about their own absence and denigration in society in school, where she said women's self-esteem is minimized with each additional year of high school and that women are still measuring themselves against the expectation that women are silent.

Due to the backlash on women's rights from the Reagan and Bush administrations, Steinem said women need to form small groups and organize together and support each other. She said women need to begin to treat themselves as well as they have been treating others.

Steinem said socially accepted gender roles are the deepest root of violence and that they are the theft of self-esteem.

"When discussing an issue, women feel responsible and guilty, said Steinem. "Men talk with intellectual interest."

Steinem said there can be no answer to the question of balancing a career and motherhood until men start asking the question, and not just women.

"Things won't change until men are raising children as much as women, said Steinem. "We need men who are humanizing. We need to kill superwoman."

Responding to a question from a woman in the audience about how to deal with everyday sexual harassment, Steinem said women need to stop swallowing humiliation and start responding to each event as it happens.

"We're for anything that's off its [expletive], said Steinem. "We're moving. This is a movement."

Her latest book, Revolution from Within: A Book of Self Esteem, which explores both how women can suffer from lack of self-esteem, and be transformed by recapturing it. She is an editorial consultant of the national feminist bimonthly Ms. magazine, which she co-founded in 1972.

Steinem's talk was free and open to the public and part of an ongoing series of lectures sponsored by the Five College Women's Studies Research Center and Odyssey Bookshop.

Concluding her talk, Steinem said "I've discovered that if our greatest dreams for ourselves weren't already real, we couldn't even dream them."

that she had to close the doors to hundreds of women waiting in line to see Steinem is proof that feminism is still alive and strong, despite reports from The New York Times that feminism is dead.

"If this many people means that feminism is dead, then The New York Times is crazy," said Hornstein.

Hornstein said the goal of the department and the Five College Women's Studies Research Center, which she is the director of, was to bring as many people as possible together.

"And we succeeded in our goal," said Hornstein, adding, "It's important that hundreds of students recognize the tremendous connection between [Steinem's] work and our lives, said Hornstein.

Alex Paul, a sophomore at Hampshire College said he enjoyed her talk and said as he was leaving, he noticed that everyone was really happy and had big smiles on their faces.

"She really brought everyone together," said Cassee Stevens, a sophomore at Mt. Holyoke College. "There was so much she said that I liked. She's wonderful."

"I should have brought my husband," said Tiffany Ross-Mitchel, a Mt. Holyoke student. She said hearing Steinem would have made her husband realize how Steinem validated her feelings and also to give him encouragement to make certain changes.

Amherst resident Jerry Fredette, one of the few men at the informal discussion, said he was impressed by Steinem's speech. He agreed with Steinem about the necessity of breaking down gender role barriers but considered it a difficult social task.

"But there needs to be a change," Fredette said.

Words mislead representation of radical ideas

By FRANCIS ZERA
Collegian Staff

The way lesbians use words to describe themselves and their feelings do not always represent the radical social ideas they would like, according to a feminist author who spoke last Friday.

Julia Penelope's hour-long lecture, titled "Lesbian New-Rotics: Bogus or Breakthrough?" discussed not only feminist and lesbian concerns but the constraints of stereotypical language as well. She has been widely published in the feminist press.

Penelope's lecture was part of the continuing series of Brown Bag lunches sponsored by the Program for Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Concerns. Approximately 20 people attended the lecture.

According to Penelope, changing the accepted societal meaning of words pertaining to women is essential for feminist communication. Many words carry "male sexuality inherent in their meaning" and are thus difficult to apply to lesbians, Penelope said.

"Class is the significant feature that distinguishes erotica from pornography," said Penelope, adding that rich men buy erotica and poor men buy pornography. She described erotica as consisting of glossy, air-brushed photographs, as opposed to black and white newsprint photos.

She went on to say that this class difference translates to the treatment of women by these men, as well as how women are seen.

She emphasized her theme as a goal of "transforming the naming and wording of actions and ideas reclaiming patriarchal words" in order to change common acceptance of a word's meaning to one which fits what the lesbian community would like to project.

However, according to Penelope, the lesbian community is having a difficult time agreeing upon acceptable definitions for these "reclaimed" words. These words include "erotic" and "erotica," which Penelope states carry only the meaning that patriarchical society has ascribed to them.

"American society is extremely loud in its anti-sex morality," said Penelope, but she stated that in truth, "they're not anti-erotic, they just don't want people to talk about it, not in public, anyways."

State politicians discuss educational issues

By JENNIFER BARROWS
Collegian Correspondent

A panel discusson centering on educational issues and the election of three University students to leadership positons were the highlights of the fourth annual College Democrats of Massachusetts convention on Saturday in the Campus Center.

The panel, which included State Representatives David Magnani (D-Framingham) and Ellen Story (D-Amherst), State Senator Stan Rosenburg (D-Amherst) and U.S. Rep. John Olver (D-Amherst), focused on the goals and responsibilities of public education.

All four panelists agreed that sufficient funding is needed in order to improve the quality of public education.

One issue brought before the panel by an audience member was "Is it a teacher's job to deal with a student's psychological issues?"

Representative Magnani said, "A child cannot be taught if he is not ready to learn. Teachers have to be freed up from non-education issues. They need resources and training in order to deal with these issues. The school should be the community center. This center used to be the church, but now it must be the school."

The panelists all agreed that education is a right rather than a privilege.

Rep. Story posed four issues as the prime goals of education. The first one is that people must strive for pluralism. There are many different people who are not connecting, according to Story. The second goal is to protect access to higher education. Tuition should be lower.

"Should a college education be required?" asked Story.

The third goal, according to Story is the economy. People will change careers seven or eight times in their lifetimes.

The fourth goal is service. "Should service to the community be required?" Story asked. "Should someone coach a little league team? Should service be required for only students or also for faculty and staff?"

Rep. Magnani, a UMass graduate, said "the process of education should be joyful. The client of education is the student."

Senator Rosenburg, who also was a student at the university, is actively involved in education. He was a state representative on the education committee.

Rosenburg who grew up on the North Shore told the audience he was a product of public education.

"We should be dealing with issues such as AIDS and Drugs. Schools should play a role in dealing with such issues. This requires the right attitudes and values. These must be developed locally," Rosenburg said.

"My role is to pose the issues as part of the Clinton plan," Olver said.

Clinton, who is a strong advocate of education, is not called the education president but he undoubtedly deserves the title, according to Olver.

All of the politicians present voiced their support of higher education. It should be available to everyone, said the panelists.

"Everyone should get into teaching if not for their entire career, at least for a couple of years," said Story.

The candidates running for positions in the state-wide organization College Democrats of Massachusetts were: Emily Rose (UMass), and Peggy Banaszek (Mt. Holyoke) for treasurer; Matt Malone (UMass) ran unopposed for secretary; Will Medoncka (Suffolk), and Mike Caputo (Northeastern) for vice president; Neil Carpenter (UMass) ran unopposed for president.

The results of the race for treasurer and vice president were Emily Rose and Will Medoncka respectively.

Rose hopes that as treasurer she can organize fund-raising and secure accounts. Rose, who is also S.G.A. treasurer feels that "we have not targeted the politicians who can donate to our club."

Candidate Forum

Editor's note: This is the first of a series of editorials written by candidates for the upcoming Student Goverment association election March 9 and 10.

I once heard that democracy is a struggle between authority and participation. This very struggle takes place day after day on this campus. The campus administration is full of people who have lost sight of why they are here. They are here because of We the Students. The doctrine of in loco parentis went out with the 1970s. It is time that the administration realize they are dealing with educated adults and not children.

Jeffrey R.
TURCO

I was once told by an administrator, "Well, you know, the squeaky wheel gets the grease." It is time that the student body stands up and makes itself heard. Whether it be reform in Health Services, minority retention, tuition/fee increases, issues with the town of Amherst or a bank machine in Southwest, we must become that "squeaky wheel." During the past few years, the student body has been driven into a state of apathy because their voices went unheard. As the campus administration is gaining many new and more responsive people, this is the time to speak up.

Student government, over the years, has made great strides in representing the concerns of the students. They have dealt with issues that affect our lives on campus every day. The people involved in student government are no different from you or I; they live in dorms, off-campus or in a fraternity or sorority house. Their concerns are our concerns and vice versa. The reason why they are heard is because they stand up for themselves and they fight against those things which hurt them as students. In effect, they have empowered themselves. In the process of standing up for themselves, they have stood up for their fellow students.

Student government is the means by which students' participation will check the administration's authority. Student government, however, can only be as effective as the students involved in it. The student voice will only be heard when students empower themselves by speaking out. If you go to a store and are shortchanged, you don't just walk out; you ask for what is yours. We, as students, must begin to take this attitude about UMass and our education. Thanks to the activism of past student bodies, we are given a voice at the highest level of the University, the Board of Trustees. It is essential that for students' concerns and issues to be addressed this position must be filled with a student who knows the system, and can work within it.

My experiences in the governmental/administrative field include three years as a legislative intern, three years in student government, president of my fraternity, president of the Inter-Fraternity Council, as well as a host of other positions. The trustee must have the trust of the students, a knowledge of the system, and the ability to lead. I feel that my six-plus years of experience have given me what is necessary to lead the fight for the empowerment of students. The trustee position is not about liberal or conservative, Black or White, Jewish or Christian; it is about students and student concerns. If we lose sight of this then the movement for empowerment of students will fail. We must put aside our differences and find a common good, otherwise the only losers will be We, the Students.

In closing, I ask your support in the struggle for student participation against administrative authority. It is you the student who will decide whether or not We, the Students, will succeed in our efforts to empower ourselves. Thank you.

Jeffrey R. Turco is an undergraduate candidate for the office of student trustee.

Will Americans ever turn from grunge to the bleep?

I remember writing home when I first arrived in America that this was a country where people still listened to bands. For at least the last two years in England it seemed the only new music you heard was on borrowed or copied tapes, streams of house, garage and techno songs that only deejays knew the names of.

Jesse
ARMSTRONG

Popular culture and subculture are difficult to write about; the sands of cool blow in curious formations and never stop shifting, and no one likes to have their own niche misrepresented. Often subcultures only flourish under benign neglect; the bright lights of the mass-media either cripple them, or make them grow rapid, leggy and weak. But why do certain subcultures flourish in one place but not another?

Rave, techno, house, garage: the names are various but dance music, the clothes, night-life and drugs associated with it have been the ascendant musical form and subculture in Britain since 1988-89. But why hasn't it flourished in a similar way in the United States? Of course this is not to say dance music isn't popular here; in parts of California, New York, Chicago and Denver a rave scene exists and indeed much of the creative energy of dance music continues to come from this side of the Atlantic. Yet in the U.K. there isn't a record shop in the country that doesn't have flyers for raves on the counter.

I can think of three important reasons why dance has triumphed as the subculture in Britain and remained a small one in America: geography, drugs and the dynamics of race.

Geography seems almost too obvious to mention, but it has probably been crucial to the growth of dance culture that nowhere in Britain is really that far from anywhere else. It is quite possible for someone in the north to travel to a club or rave in Manchester or Liverpool or get to London or Brighton from the south in a couple of hours, whereas huge numbers of American youth live too far from centers of U.S. dance culture to participate — and rave, like punk, is a subculture of participation. No one is converted by the music in isolation; identification comes from the energy of hundreds of people dancing to live mixing.

It would be dishonest to write about dance culture without mentioning drug use. Ecstacy consumption grew symbiotically with the explosion of rave culture. A drug that makes you stay up all night and want to dance, together with a euphoric sense of good-feeling towards others, both fitted and shaped the scene. Naturally there is a down side to the drug, not the least of which is people buying anonymous white tablets in dark corners of clubs and raves oblivious to whether it is MDMA (ecstacy), ketamine (a battlefield anesthetic being sold in Manchester clubs last year) or chalk dust they are consuming in their $25 tablets. As for the long-term effects, they are largely unknown.

Dick Habdige, the cultural theorist who talked at Smith College last week, mentioned the "spatial and cultural apartheid" of America and this is the last and most incorporeal factor in considering Anglo-American differences in subculture. For while Black and White subcultures often stay separate in the U.K. there was enough cross-fertilization to provide what really was, for a while at least, a pretty much color-blind scene. It seems that perhaps the forces against this type of racial-cultural flux are more rigid in America where rap and rock, both in all their many forms, pretty much have popular music sewn up.

Of course, even geography, drug availability and racial barriers may eventually all prove powerless to stop the spread of dance culture, driven as it is by what one American convert called "the deep pounding bass that rivets your soul."

Deceit has no place in journalism

6:32 p.m., March 1, 1998.

"And now, NBC Nightly News Corrections with Fuzzy Buzzword in New York."

"Good evening, this is Fuzzy Buzzword. Our top correction tonight: the hurricane we reported in South Carolina last night apparently never happened. In other corrections, NBC News today announced that their anchor was 'just kidding' when he announced a major change in nuclear policy in Russia. When we return: Bill Clinton was never really elected president; we made it up."

Peter J.
ORVETTI

The line between news and entertainment continued to blur last week with a little-noticed correction on NBC Nightly News. In an ecology report, NBC used footage of fish that were reported dead; in fact, the fish were actually alive. Even more surprising: the footage was of a different location than stated — not only were the fish not dead, they were not even the right fish to begin with.

Ordinarily, this faux pas could be tolerated, but not coming from the National Belying Company. It was NBC that was the center of a controversy a few weeks ago regarding the rigging of a General Motors vehicle to burst into flames, to "jazz up" an otherwise dull Dateline NBC report.

NBC's failure to live up to the basic, and not overly complicated, rules of journalism is a watermark in the disturbing trend downward in media, especially in television news. What an anchor perceives as a witticism or an offhand remark may throw bias into a story; even a grin or a smirk is questionable where objectivity is concerned. But these human traits can be forgiven; what cannot be is the intentional shunning of fact to create a piece that is more "pleasurable" or "exciting" for the viewing audience.

Objective journalism is already on the defensive against programs like Geraldo and Hard Copy. When the mainstream media, and even the news networks, begin experimenting with the boundaries of truth, journalism suffers an irreparable blow.

There is a great deal of difference between analysis, investigation and reporting, yet each of these requires informed, non-judgmental action and research on the part of the reporter.

Journalists are bound to seek out the truth and to report it as they see it. Of course, this leaves room for interpretation. But this does not leave room for setting up automobiles so that they will explode or for using footage of one area and calling it someplace else.

The networks would do well to leave the deceit and conjecture to Geraldo Rivera and Maureen O'Boyle and stick to straight journalism. The "mistakes" of NBC are troubling. But even more troubling is the idea that, should this downward trend continue, the fictitious corrections report five years hence may turn into reality.

Peter J. Orvetti is a student at Hampshire College.

Women will keep control over their bodies

This is to the conservative, Bush/Reagan-loving oppressor who exercised his constitutional rights. Well, Mr. Man, I'm now exercising mine. You must have expected silence from us women. Welcome to the 20th century where women choose to do what they want with their own bodies. Do not think you can dictate what women can and cannot do any longer.

We will no longer remain silent with swollen bellies, bound feet and gagged mouths. The chains have been broken and we are free. We will not give up that newfound freedom. You must think you have unlimited power with your aggressive tendencies while under the influence of alcohol. Reality check: you have testosterone coursing through your body and it is not a big deal.

Do you support war? One human life for another. Why do you support it? "It is for the good of all human beings." Perhaps we were all meant to die out. You are supporting that thought pattern by killing off our women one by one by forcing them to resort to illegal abortions. I do not want to live in a world of unwanted children and resentful mothers. I would want to welcomed into this world with open arms. Wouldn't you?

We will continue having abortions, with or without the consent of men or our parents. No one will take that away. It is legal now and will continue to be. Face it Mr. Fascism — you have lost.

SWAG was not a front for Housing

In response to the article about SGA, Southwest Area Government and the Women's Conference [Collegian, Feb. 19], I would like to present the actual facts of the "exposé." Major details were left out and story was not told in its entirety. On behalf of SWAG, I would like to add that we were made to look like absolute imbeciles in the Collegian story by both the SGA and the individual who edited the story.

I was called by two correspondents who asked me if the allegations against SWAG were true: if we were a front for Housing to get money from the SGA, knowing that they could allocate money only to RSOs. SWAG was finally in the clear and we were redeemed. I gave SGA the proposal for the 1993 Women's Conference. My officers were behind me and my involvement with the conference.

I am not denying there was confusion when I submitted the proposal to the finance committee. The representative with whom I spoke said because the proposal was on Housing stationery, she would not consider it. I explained that one of the women on the steering committee was an RD, hence the stationery. I was chair for the sponsorship committee, and told her it was for an event SWAG was helping to sponsor. She knew I was a senator and was aware of their policies. In no way were we ever a front for Housing! This was made clear to two representatives on SGA's Finance Committee. On Feb. 17, I was told they could consider my proposal because it was on the behalf of SWAG.

I don't appreciate SWAG being dragged through the mud and having SGA make us look like puppets, and I don't appreciate a lack of organization on the part of the Senate and the Finance Committee. I'd like to thank my fellow officers for standing with me through this. I would also like to thank those from the Women's Conference Steering Committee who defended our proposal to the Finance Committee.

Health Services: bravely battling the flu, condoms in hand

Everyday they trudge into Health Services, wheezing, sniffling, hacking students looking for some relief, some sort of drug-induced respite from their symptoms. While health officials deny there's a reason to fear an epidemic, they believe that UMass has been severely hit by a curious strain of the flu. I spoke with a Health Services representative yesterday.

How many students report to Health Services a day?

DOC: We've been getting about 100 a day. Many are quite sick and some have been exhibiting symptoms of a hallucinogenic nature. It was kind of funny, but we had a TA come in who swore there was another TA protruding from her head. We get a handful of cases like that a semester. But the majority of patients have typical coughs and fevers. It's unfortunate, but several have come to Health Services sick after they apparently tried to eat some home appliances. We usually get several of those a semester, too.

We had a lot of problems with the Metallica concert, people coming in with partial hearing loss, minor brain damage, that sort of thing. I've personally treated several people who were suffering from stress-related delirium due to a failure to acquire basketball tickets. Sadly enough, I had a few who hadn't even acquired a student activity card. We'll shuttle some of those case over to Mental Health Services.

Is there any cause of alarm for students?

DOC: I would say no. The people who get sick are usually in bed for a week. Then they feel fine. I've seen worse years, believe me. Health Services is pleased to report that there have been no flu-related fatalities this semester. Also, we are working on ways to improve our handling of this recent influx of sick students. It's an exciting new development. In the next year, we may have a conveyor belt system where students will be treated quickly and efficiently while moving on a conveyor belt, kind of like an assembly line.

David
MASSEY

Using the latest medical technology, machines will take temperatures, perform routine blood tests and dispense condoms while doctors perform quick check-ups on the moving students. Several schools already have such a system. In terms of controlling stress, I suggest watching basketball games on TV, avoiding large Gen-Ed lectures with vague course requirements and staying away from Whitmore.

Do you have any advice for students who believe they may be coming down with something?

DOC: Stay in your room and drink fluids. Do not talk to anyone and stay off the phone. That could be particularly harmful to a sick person. Stay away from open windows and avoid Top-40 music. Reduce your breathing rate. In the next few weeks, we may do a mass mailing of flu prevention kits to all students. They will consist of a variety pack of condoms, safe sex brochures and similar latex items. Condoms are a key part of your health. We think if more people had condoms, there might be a lot less colds out there. Also, we have contacted many teachers about the large number of ill students and have urged them to cut out the boring parts of their lectures.

I've been hearing a lot of horror stories about misdiagnosed patients, misplaced prescriptions, students collapsing in the waiting room. Is there any truth to that?

DOC: When you're dealing with this many students who need medical attention, it's tough. We gave condoms to one student who, we later found out, actually had a broken arm. Those things happen. Also, I found out that a member of the football team was given a prescription for morning sickness. Hopefully the conveyor belt system will alleviate much of the present confusion.

Back to what you were saying before, I'm not quite sure of the connection between the flu and condoms?

DOC: Campus surveys indicate that students are still having sex and so we want to play a major role in that. If we could come right into your bedroom and offer consultation, we would do that. Since it's not practical, we find that targeting sick students is the best way to get the message across.

Any truth to those rumors about shutting down the school?

DOC: That's nonsense. It's a big school, there's a lot of sick folks out there, but we got a lot of condoms to fight this. Let's not throw in the towel yet.

How much can we take?

"Some people should die, that's just unconscious knowledge." — Jane's Addiction

I don't quite fully agree. I'm very conscious that some people should die, preferably an ignoble and painful death. Most people would probably disagree with that statement immediately, purely out of instinct. After all, we've risen above that level. We are no longer a society that believes in the eye-for-an-eye ethic. That tendency to pass instant, harsh judgment is something we've outgrown. We're more civilized than that. Aren't we?

David Michael
PAYE

But when you think about it, don't we still believe in those very things? What's the death penalty but good old retribution, Old Testament style? The gas chamber or noose is a bit cleaner than stoning someone to death, but the same moral principle is involved. Step out of line with society/the tribe/the government and you will be paid back in kind, if not more severely.

Let's take it to a more personal level. We've all been at that point where we want to do immeasurable damage to another person, a family member or some random person who robbed your house or dented your car or looked at you wrong when you were having a bad day. Regardless of who, what, when or why, everybody has at one point or another been filled with the urge to hurt someone. It's safe to say a large percentage of us have attempted to inflict some degree of harm on someone else.

Of course, killing someone is a different story. I'm sure we've all said or thought, "I want to kill [blank]," but not many have actually tried. For one thing, nobody particularly wants to face the electric chair or imprisonment. And secondly, that sentiment usually comes on the heels of anger, and then we calm down and realize it was something silly and minor that upset us, that we were all worked up over nothing.

Now to the meat of the matter: what about those who really are that bad? And we all know some of them, don't we?

Like the kind of person who would steal from a friend, break into his house when he's not around. The kind of pathetic weasel who has to beat up his girlfriend because anybody else he tried to push around would send him to the hospital.

Or those people who bring no real pleasure to anyone, but just go out in packs, get drunk or stoned and start fights they couldn't lose because of two or three to one odds. They have to make others feel small so they feel they have some kind of power. If they did get killed, who would really mourn them? Do they really like each other or are they not friends, but rather pack mates, like wild dogs, who band together because individually they have no courage?

Or maybe those guys who rape children, leaving them scarred and scared?

These people who do nothing but destroy, not physically, but spiritually — are they really "not that bad"? How can they not deserve to die?

Nobody can appoint himself or herself judge, jury and executioner. Nobody can say that he or she has never done anything that hurt someone else. None of us are saints. But most of us have given as well as taken, and created some kind of happiness for someone else. But some people don't.

Studies show pot is harmless

I am writing in response to David Rivera's column [Collegian, Feb. 23]. The opinions and suppositions about marijuana contained within it have no basis in fact. As a legalization activist, I have researched this issue extensively, and I can assure the reader that Mr. Rivera does not know what he is talking about, as the following citations show.

• Mayor LaGuardia's Committee on Marijuana (New York, 1938) was the first extensive American study on marijuana and its effects. After several months of research the committee released its report: "Those who have been smoking marijuana for a period of years showed no mental or physical deterioration which may be attributed to the drug."

• In 1972, President Nixon created the National Commission on Marijuana and Drug Abuse. It is the most comprehensive study on marijuana's effects to date: "There is little danger of physical or psychological harm from the experimental or intermittent use of cannabis." Furthermore, the commission recommended the legalization for personal use.

• In 1974, the U.S. Army commissioned a study on marijuana's effects on discipline and motivation: "No evidence was obtained that marijuana produces significant adverse effects on cognitive or neurological function."

• In 1987, the Harvard Medical School released a medical reports on the effects of marijuana: "Experiments in the U.S. show no effects of fairly heavy marijuana use on learning, perception or motivation, over periods as long as a year." Additionally: "Three major studies... found no evidence of intellectual or neurological damage, no changes in personality, and no loss of the will to work or to participate in society."

• In 1988 the DEA commissioned administrative law judge Francis L. Young to do a comprehensive study on the "dangers" of marijuana. In his final report he states, "In strict medical terms, marijuana is far safer than many foods we consume. . . marijuana in its natural form is one of the safest therapeutically active substances known to man."

Given the inaccuracies in Mr. Rivera's column, I conclude one of two things: that he is unfamiliar with the facts and is relying on popular misconceptions. Otherwise he is aware of the facts and deliberately distorted them. If the former is true than he is simply ignorant and I hope I have cleared the matter up for him. If it is the latter I find him to have engaged in a base act of hypocrisy and mendaciousness.

The truth about tipping

What I'm about to say might save you the guilt of committing a crime. Maybe it will actually infect you with this guilt, because you've been committing this crime for a long time.

The topic is tipping in restaurants — an awkward topic for some, due to misconceptions about it. I am a waitress and, like all servers, I suffer a salary cut because of these falsehoods.

Amy
SCOTT

The first serious misconception is that tipping is a discreet, hush-hush practice — something you do when nobody is looking. People will throw their hands over the tip they put down if they think you're looking. This teaches that the service given in exchange for the tip is demeaning and that the server is getting a handout. Well, I'm no panhandler, I'm a waitress. I perform a legitimate service and expect to be paid for it.

Many believe that servers are paid to serve by the restaurant. We do not get a salary for our work in the manner most people do. Instead, we are paid a minimum wage of $2.55 hourly (there's no such thing as raises for servers anymore) to keep up the restaurant and represent the restaurant properly. The restaurant and the IRS expect 15 percent of all food sales that go to the tables a server waits on to be tipped to the server by their parties. The IRS automatically pulls the taxes due on this 15 percent out of a server's weekly check.

Maybe you're wondering how restaurants, the IRS or your server can think of asking you to pay the price of your bill plus 15 percent. The answer is simple: this system greatly benefits you. Many think the price of the food covers every service that restaurant performs. Wrong. The cost to pay servers a full, regular wage is intentionally left out. Instead, the restaurant leaves the business of paying for wait service solely to the customer's discretion. Obviously if customers don't get proper service they're not going to pay for it. Who would pay for something they didn't get?

Let's reverse this theory. If the customer did receive proper service, shouldn't they have to pay for it? You don't get anything for free, and you should never expect to. Stiffing your server is stealing. Few restaurants or servers possess the intestinal fortitude to tell you this, but if you stiff your server you are actually unwelcome in that restaurant. You are a crook.

But what if you didn't like the service? Remember this: the act of stiffing is intended to be a grave insult to your server. It means the service was so bad that you think the server should be fired and hope to never be waited on in that manner again. It also cuts a person's income. If you stiff your server you better mean it. Your decision will be taken as a slap in the face.

To pay properly for you service, follow these guidelines: if you received the service you required to fulfill dining needs, pay 15 percent; if you got that and more, give more; if you didn't get the service you needed, give less. Never stiff your server unless the server literally did nothing for you.

Still the question remains unanswered. How does the customer benefit from the gratuity system? The answer is this: if there's a chance a server could make more than a lousy $2.55 plus some variable amount in tips, the server will do a good job. Customers in a tipping restaurant would never get the level of service and attention if their servers made a flat wage. Because of this system, servers care enough to make sure customers get quality service. If they didn't care, they wouldn't make any money.

Now that you all understand what tipping is all about I feel I can say, without any apprehension, that I hope to have the pleasure of waiting on each and every one of you some day.

BELOW IS A PROGRESS REPORT OF MULTICULTURAL ACTIVITIES. Reports, issued from the Chancellor's office, will be written each month. The intent of the reports, and the essays, by different faculty or staff members, is not only to follow agreements reached between the administration and ALANA students, but also to list the efforts of the community at large in working towards a truly multicultural campus.

"What it means to be, and How to Become Multicultural"
by Bailey Jackson,
Dean of the School of Education.

Organizations of all types and sizes are grappling with what it means to be and how to become "multicultural." I have spent several years studying organizational attempts to become more multicultural. In so doing, I have gained a few insights and developed a few models that seem to have some practical applicability as we at the University of Massachusetts at Amherst continue our pursuit of the "multicultural campus."

First is an understanding of the place for and limits of "awareness training," "consciousness raising," or education as strategies for reaching the goal. Historically, these types of strategies and techniques have been used to address the various objectives adopted to enable a campus to become more "multicultural." Many advocates of individual, education, consciousness raising, and awareness training as strategies for achieving a multicultural campus are now beginning to appreciate the limitations of these approaches. It has become clear that these strategies alone will not produce the kind of campus/systems change required to become a multicultural campus. Or, as some might say it, "individual consciousness raising is necessary but not sufficient to produce campus wide change."

For some, this shift to a focus on the organization as the target for change is new; for others, the campus, as a complex organization, has always been the target for change. However, in most cases the strategy for making that change relied on tactics based on an assumption that since organizations are made up of individuals, the organization/system can be changed by changing the individuals in it—one by one if necessary. Building on what we know about the University campus as a complex network of systems, each with its own personality, it seems obvious to most that the target of change is the meta system (the campus); the three major subsystems (academic affairs, student affairs, and administrative affairs); and the Schools, Colleges and Departments within the three major system components (mission, values, structure, management practices, services, technology, e.g., curriculum and psycho-social dynamics) can and should be a target for change.

Second is the importance of the vision that an organization holds of itself as "multicultural." What is our "vision" of a multicultural campus? What is goodness? For someone, the vision or goal has been to make the campus and its organizational units less oppressive, on the assumption that if we get rid of the disease (social oppression) we will have health (a multicultural campus). For others, the goal has been to make the campus more numerically inclusive (proportionally representative of various social and cultural groups) and civil, on the assumption that if we work toward becoming more civil and numerically inclusive that the system of social oppression will work itself out in the process or at least diminish as a result. I find myself taking the position that the goal must include both being less socially oppressive as well as more inclusive of social diversity. While it seems the goal that brings together attention to social oppression and social inclusion is the one we should be pursuing, I would emphasize the importance of attending to the manifestations of social oppression before we can begin to think about working toward social inclusion. What is being suggested is that the more social oppression. What is being suggested is that the more social oppression we are able to eliminate the more we allow for energy, interest, and success at achieving social inclusion—becoming a multicultural campus.

Achieving clarity of vision is indeed a first and critical step toward becoming a multicultural campus. Being able to asses where we are in relation to that vision and setting a course based on that assessment are equally important. We must remember it is not helpful to continue our legacy of dualistic thinking on this issue, which frames the issue—We are either a multicultural campus or we are not. It seems to be more helpful to most organizations/ campuses to think about this as a kind of development continuum. At one end of this continuum is our vision of a multicultural campus; the other end is some notion of a campus that is antithetical to that vision. The other points on the continumm can be thought of as stages in the development of an organization that is moving toward becoming a multicultural organization.

In brief the points or stages on that continuum are:

STAGE ONE: the campus, School, College or Department that is most against or hostile to the concept of social diversity. This campus is exclusionary in its policies, practices, mission and values. Justice is for those who deserve it and the group in power will decide who deserves it.

STAGE TWO: the Campus, School, College or Department that does not overtly advocate the practice or discrimination, harassment, and other manifestations of social oppression, but does adopt and maintain policies and practices that have the effect of continuing a "club" like environment that provides privilege for dominant group members. this type of organization may not be overtly hostile to pleas for social justice and diversity but is more likely to argue against its importance and centrality to the mission.

STAGE THREE: The campus, School, College or Department that sees diversity as "numbers" and legal issues. This organization typically wants to provide access to those who have been denied access. A primary goal or strategy for becoming a multicultural campus in this case is to make the campus or campus unit numerically correct. Getting the proportions of different kinds of people in the system is not seen as a means to an end. It more often than not is seen as the end.

STAGE FOUR: The Campus, School, College or Department that wants to provide more than access for those who have been denied that access. This system wants to insure success for all its members. Attention is paid to those policies, practices, norms, and attitudes that reduce the chances that any member of the campus community will succeed in the existing system.

STAGE FIVE: The Campus, School, College or Department that wants to go beyond simply insuring success in a historically mono-cultural system. At this stage, the campus or campus unit seek to be more than a mono-cultural system that is "non-discriminatory." This puts energy into redefining its vision so that it reflects both social justice and social/cultural diversity. An assessment of every aspect and component of the system is conducted in a manner that allows the system to determine where it is and where it needs to change. A concrete plan id developed and supported that will actualize this vision.

STAGE SIX: The Campus, School, College or Department that has achieved social justice for all, the full inclusion of the interests and contributions of all social and cultural identity groups, is widely known as an advocate for social justice and diversity and has been successful at using these attributes to enhance the learning environment for all.

This brief overview of the stages that systems seem to move through has proven helpful for many organizations attempting to become "multicultural organizations" because they at least provide a language that can be used to assess where we are and where we think we need to go. These stages can also be helpful in determining how we will get there. As we move forward, I trust we will continue to learn and share our knowledge on "how to become a multicultural campus."

PROGRESS REPORT REGARDING THE MULTICULTURAL CAMPUS

In keeping with the 11/7/92 ALANA agreements:

1/22/93 The Chancellor and the Provost wrote to every faculty member providing data about minority composition of all departments and urging them to make every effort to reflect the nation-wide availability pool of qualified candidates.

1/25/93 Assistant director of admissions accepted the position of associate director of admissions. A key responsibility of this position will be the development of a minority student recruitment plan.

1/26/93 The RA Role Review Commitee completed its work, and Vice Chancellor for Student Affiars, Tom Robinson, shared its findings with the campus community.

2/2/93 The Search Committee for the Training and Development Manager for the campus was begun.

2/3/93 Chancellor O'Brien asked that chairs of search committees invite ALANA students to seminars of faculty candidates or interview sessions of professional employees during the search process for appointments.

2/8/93 The Asian Alliance met with Vice Chancellor Robinson. An agreement was reached to expand and renovate the space for the United Asian Learning Resource Center in Knowlton.

Other initiatives taken:

1/22/93 The Chancellor requested that the Campus Chronicle publish days of religious observance the week before they occur to improve the knowledge and sensitivity of those who need to make special arrangements.

2/4/93 The Chancellor met with newly designated Chancellor's Task Force on Gay, Lesbian, and Bisexual Equality.

2/16/93 The Chancellor's Commission on Civility in Human Relations requested proposals from the campus community for educational and program activities which have the following goals: to enhance understanding of multicultural issues, to encourage collaboration between different campus communities and constituencies, and to promote mutual respect.

12/16/92 The Chancellor's Awards for Multiculturalism were created. Three awards will be made each spring; one will be for graduate or undergraduate students, one for staff, and one for faculty. Each will consist of a Certificate of Appreciation and a $1,000 award. The awards will be based upon contributions made towards a multicultural campus, with special attention paid to individuals whose efforts go far beyond the expectations of their positions. The award will be presented at a special event in celebration of contributions towards a diverse, multicultural campus.

2/25/92 The Mather Career Center arranged a trip for ALANA students to the Career Expo '93 in Boston.

2/26/92 The Institute for Advanced studies in the Humanities offered two seminars: "Is There a Multicultural Middle Ages" which examined this period in terms of its diversity and "Anti-Semitism" which looked at its recent history, socio-pathological development, resurgences and avenues of resolution.

Engrossing quest fuels wayward Joe Turner's

By SHAWN McDONNELL
Collegian Staff

Joe Turner's Come and Gone
Rand Theatre
Feb. 25 - 27

When the deacon Herald Loomis (Timothy E. Blake) is released from a convict labor gang after seven years of servitude, it means re-entering a world which has left him behind. Discovering his child abandoned, and unable to find his wife, Loomis sets out on a quest to reclaim his past.

It is this quest which is at the center of Joe Turner's Come and Gone, and in the hands of dramatist August Wilson (Ma Rainey's Black Bottom, Fences) it seems swelled with mythic implications. It is not a lost spouse which Loomis is seeking, through the miasma of his confused existence, but a forgotten image of himself. Stumbling through the detritus of his African heritage, and fleeing from a white Catholic God he can no longer accept, Loomis is a man with no true past to return to.

"You forgot your song," explains Bynum Walker (Gregory-Dean Smith), the spiritualist Loomis meets at a Pittsburgh boarding house. "A fellow forget that, and he forget who he is."

Walker's unnerving insights into Loomis' character hold the promise of salvation, but it is clear that Walker is on a quest of his own.

As staged by Nefertiti Burton in the current Rand Theatre production, Joe Turner is a long and wayward, but ultimately engrossing redemption parable.

Burton is a capable director, and her production is strong in its dramatic presentation, but most of the credit for the evening's success must go to superior acting and designing.

Most impressive among these is Larry Novakov-Lawlor's wondrous set design, in which the meagre, homey sadness of a boarding house dissolves into a bleak view of leaning telephone poles and crawling factory smoke. This urban panorama does more to evoke the feeling of time and place than any exposition could, and is equal in its scope to the best cityscapes of designers like Tony (House of Blue Leaves) Walton.

As lit by Thomas P. Morgan, this expanse of phone wires and smog can be utterly oppressive, or almost beautiful.

Equally exceptional is the performance of Timothy E. Blake, who plays Herald Loomis with the perfect blend of tenderness and rage. The depth and feeling of his characterization closes the credibility gap which could easily accompany such a complex role.

Among the other main characters, the acting is just as good. Gregory-Dean Smith is sympathetic, if unsettling, as the mysterious "voo-doo person" who holds the key to Loomis' future, Rick Scott Gordon and Ingrid C. Askew are likably crotchety as the married owners of the boarding house, and Cynthia Hope Bailey is surprisingly effective as Loomis' devoted daughter. Even Brandon Whitehead, in the small-but-pivotal role of a white "people finder," seems to strike all the right notes.

The one disappointment of Joe Turner

Peter's Friends is a shallow, guilty pleasure

By JON LUPO
Collegian Staff

Peter's Friends has been erroneously labeled a British-Big Chill knockoff, mainly because the characters are about as English as Kevin Costner was in Robin Hood. Director/actor Kenneth Branagh (Dead Again) has fashioned this thin piece of comedic therapy with a loose, we-know-this-has-been-done-before like charm, resulting in a wildly uneven film with as many hits as misses.

While this is pure laugh n' cry claptrap, Peter's Friends is amiable entertainment — one of those kinds of films where everyone knows where its heading, but no one seems to care, partly because it's such a fun trip there.

All about six Cambridge friends who reunite 10 years after their last hurrah at a stately country estate owned by Peter (Stephen Fry). The plot follows standard form from here on: there are fights, makeups, laughs, tears, songs, memories, sex, etc. By the time Peter's big revelation comes at the end, the film has pretty much run out of gas. Yet Branagh knows when to stop this merry go round of comic melodrama just at the right time — at least for me.

Peter's friends aren't really characters; their more a collection of neuroses. There's Peter himself, a bisexual with a dry wit. Branagh himself plays a stale sitcom writer married to the star of his show (Rita Rudner), while Roger (Hugh Laurie) and Mary (Imelda Staunton), commercial jingle writers, have their marriage tested over the aftermath of the death of one of their infant twins.

Howards End alumna Emma Thompson (Branagh's wife) plays a flighty book editor who wants Peter and Alphonsia Emmanuel rounds out the major cast as a free-thinking woman who brings along her married lover (Tony Slattery) to the big bash.

Want to take bets now as to what's going to happen? Peter's Friends was written by comedienne Rudner (who's way out of her acting league here) and her husband Martin Bregman (an old college pal of Branagh's) and...it shows. There are a few humorous slices-of-life and plenty of biting barbs, but it's clear that in the more serious moments, Peter's Friends falls flatter than a "very special episode' of "Mr. Belvedere."

But in between these bumbling moments of cheesy melodrama, the writers' veddy clever nature shines through. Witness a funny exchange between Fry and Thompson. When Thompson throws herself (literally) at Fry in the middle of the night by baring herself at his door and pleading to "fill me up with your little babies." Fry explains why he's not interested in women by remarking that he's "not in the vagina business" and that if he was to be involved with men or women that Thompson would be right up there in his wish list, "next to Michelle Pfieffer and River Phoenix."

In fact, what ultimately rescues Peter's Friends from being a wholly interminable exercise is Branagh's crisp direction and a smartly talented cast who always seem to be better than their material.

Branagh tries to inject the familiar plotlines with an 80s retro spin, but all that's left is a blast from the not-too-distant past in the form of a nostalgic soundtrack filled with hits from Cyndi Lauper, Tears for Fears and Tina Turner. As a director with only two films under his belt before Peter's Friends, Branagh's inventive nature is regretfully only intermittently seen in this film. While he successfully manipulated Shakespeare in Henry V and nearly one-upped Hitchcock and Welles in Dead Again, Branagh seems lost in Kasdan country (Kasdan wrote and directed The Big Chill). Yet its a credit to this director's skill that he can make such a tired story seem breezy and almost fresh. Almost.

Peter's Friends turns out to be an insignificant misstep for the director. Person-

Chris Cinque performs her one-woman show, The Scrub at Hampden Theater Saturday evening

The Scrub
Hampden Theater
February 28, 1993

Agitated that I was missing Gloria Steinem's lecture at Mount Holyoke College Saturday night, I walked into the Hampden Theater with a bad attitude. Yet, as Chris Cinque's production, The Scrub began, I knew I was in the right place.

I realized that absorbing another formal intellectual feminist speech after an entire afternoon at the 1993 Women's Conference would have send me careening into the ocean of insanity.

The Scrub, attended by approximately thirty people, is an in- process dramatic comedy which will, when completed, conclude Cinque's three part performance trilogy entitled Growing Up Queer in America.

Cinque, a nationally renown playwright and actor has received a grant from the Minnesota State Art's Board, and has livened UMass theaters with her portrayals of lesbian life on more than one occasion.

Hampden Theater's modest plywood stage perched on the black concrete floor like a breakfast tray on a oversized marble counter. Adorned with a oak table, a closet filled with a myriad of outfits and chairs, the setting was simple — yet enough.

Reading from a well-written script, Chris Cinque passionately and humorously portrayed a middle-aged lesbian named Angel, who was struggling to salvage a relationship with her religious Southern mother.

Grappling with an internal conflict of her own, her mother, Lou, possessed a heart breaking secret which destroyed her faith in human kindness and helped destroy the connection between her and her daughter.

The production unfolded mysteriously, subtly supplying the audience with the evidence required to finally paste the story together.

The mother, Lou, for instance, portrayed by a Umass actor, was heard speaking to her daughter around the parameter of the theater but was never seen until the final scene of the play.

Yet, despite, the seriousness of the subject, the play is a comedy, lifting a dramatic, tolling burden off the shoulders of audience members.

For instance Angel, telling her life story, began at birth as she floated in a womb of sea water and was pulled with forceps into a light that "singed her eyelids."

She conveyed hilariously how she sought to confuse her mother by wearing a suit, "growing a mustache," and buying a fake "hard-on."

The apartment she shared with her lover was "decorated according to the advice of Better Homes and is that Burton seems unable to adjust the mood of the play, for its lighter scenes.

There is a sort of oppressive gravity to this production, which contributes to moments of strained discomfort. Innocent scenes of children-at-play become marathons of dramatic pauses, and the romantic meddlings of a playboy day-laborer (James E. Roberts II) are more sullen than they are precocious.

If this is not the best possible production of August Wilson's play, it is nevertheless an evening which makes you think and feel. That is what good drama should do, and observing the dual wonders of Timothy E. Blake's performance and August Wilson's plotting, it seems unlikely that anyone would feel unchallenged or unmoved.

Additional performances of Joe Turner's Come and Gone are March 3-6, 8:00 PM, in the Rand Theatre. Tickets are available at the door.

ally, I'm looking forward to his upcoming version of Shakespeare's Much Ado About Nothing with Thompson and Denzel Washington as well as a remake of the horror classic Frankenstein, with Branagh playing the mad scientist.

But back to Peter's Friends: an acting troupe of this caliber helps to move the rickety story along. Fry carefully walks the line between character and parody, but like all the people in Peter's Friends, character doesn't look to be that important. Emma Thompson is the other stand out in a role that isn't exactly flattering — but she makes it her own.

The cast complements each other so well, mainly because they all seem like they could be friends. There's no forced closeness, however you get the feeling they'd be funnier and more genuine if they departed from Rudner and Bergman's cloying script and started improvising.

So, is Peter's Friends worth it? It's fluff, no question, but it's the most clever piece of fluff I've encountered in a while. It's the kind of movie that comes down to the act of just going with it — take no prisoners. You'll be sorry if you're looking for high drama or even something more than skin deep emotions. Peter's Friends is a silly, shallow retread. But as a true guilty pleasure, it hits a home run. B-

Lesbians."

Lcu persistently interrupted throughout the play, correcting her daughter's memory, chastising her for revealing parts of the secret, or lecturing her on her life of sin.

The play, which is in process, appeared to be carefully, and lovingly written, revealing the author's unique life experience, and her passion for creative expression and artistic autonomy. Passages throughout the script were beautiful and crisp, generating powerful visual images and an intense emotional response.

Yet, while the production shined with talent, the fact that it was not complete soon became apparent. Rough with thought and revision, several scenes, including one in which Angel dressed up like Liz Taylor, was disconnected and confusing.

Yet, Knowing that Saturday's performance was a testing ground, I have no doubt that Chris Cinque's completed production will emerge with professionalism — and the capability of filling a very large theater.

Correction

In "Spotlight on: The Canine Bastards" [February 25, 1993], the Collegian printed the incorrect date for an upcoming UMass performance of the band. The Bastards will play the Bluewall on March 26, not March 30. The Collegian regrets the error.

Men's gymnastics fall but earn respect in loss

By ANDREW BRYCE
Collegian Staff

When a gymnastics team is defeated by over sixteen points, it is rarely considered a great effort.

The University of Massachusetts men's team lost to Syracuse University 272.05-255.85, yet had some outstanding performances on Saturday afternoon at Boyden Gym.

"We are getting a lot better," said head coach Roy Johnson. "We increased our score by eight points in three days (scoring over 247 points at Southern Connecticut on Wednesday). I don't know of a team in my fifteen years as head coach a team that has improved by that many points in that many days."

Senior co-captain Steve Christensen broke his own school record on the pommel horse for the third time this season as he scored a remarkable 9.80.

With Orangeman Rich Kuenzler preceding him with a score of 9.70, Christensen handled the pressure with ease as he broke his three day old record of 9.75, set Wednesday at Southern Connecticut.

Junior Jason Braud tied the school record as he finished in first and scored a 9.70 on the floor exercise, a performance that Johnson noted should make him a national contender in this event.

Braud also had a personal best on the parallel bars with an 8.95. The event, though, that Braud finished second in, the vault, proved to be the most exciting event of the day as all six UMass competitors landed on their feet.

The vault was our best event," said Christensen, who scored an 8.60. "With all six people landed on their feet, that happens rarely. Most teams don't do it."

Adding to the excitement on the vault was Orangeman Ofri Porat, who scored an impressive 9.70. Porat is ranked first in the nation in this event. Johnson called Porat's performance "amazing".

Parallel bars was another strong event for the Minutemen as co-captain Jay Santos finished first (9.00) and Christensen finished third. The team score of 43.65 was a season best for UMass.

High bar has been the weakness for the Minutemen all season long, yet it did show improvement. Santos and freshman Steve Goldman both finished with scores over eight (8.20 and 8.35 respectively), the first time this season UMass has achieved this.

Johnson was impressed with the performance of Jason Donnelly on the floor exercise, as he scored an 8.55.

"If Jason cleans it up, he'll be pretty good," said Johnson. "Two new parts in his routine raised his score eight tenths."

The Minutemen are now looking ahead towards next weekend's New England Championships, which will be held on Sunday, March 7 here at UMass. The meet will begin at 1 p.m.

"[On Saturday] we looked more like the team we were in December, and probably the team we could've been if we had been healthy all year," Catlett said. "This is the team we can really be; the one that played in the second half."

"It's kind of hard to tell what people think, but all we wanted them to think was that West Virginia is for real," said Robinson.

if he might have a good game before his early foul trouble forced him to sit the last three minutes of the first half. Neither player stepped up in the second half, and only Harper Williams (18 points) reached double figures, with most of his points of the "too little, too late" variety.

In what could be interpreted as a bad first half omen, UMass guard Mike Williams injured his right hand going for a loose ball at the 13 minute mark, and sat out much of the game. When he returned in the second half, Williams was ineffective. Williams had both his wrist and his finger taped, and said he was unsure of the severity of the injury and said he would be X-rayed as soon as possible.

Player of the Game

Pervires Greene, 6-8 Jr. Forward

Greene led both teams with 25 points, including 14 in the first half. Greene kept West Virginia in the game in the early going, then helped the Mountaineers with a dunk and steal early in the second half to get momentum going. Greené ran roughshod over the UMass defense, shooting 10-15 from the floor.

Why West Virginia Won

The Mountaineers forced 18 UMass turnovers, held the Minutemen to 32 percent shooting and outscored UMass 49-22 in the second half. In essence, West Virginia did everything right and UMass did everything wrong in the second half. Pervires Greene and Ricky Robinson combined for 40 points and 11 rebounds, and the forwards stifled UMass.

UMass' Next Opponent

The Minutemen host St. Bonaventure tonight at 7 p.m. at the William D. Mullins Memorial Center with a chance to wrap up the number one seed and regular season title in the Atlantic 10. The No. 1 seed means UMass will have home court in the A-10 Tourney's championship game, provided they get that far. UMass defeated the Bonnies 93-78 on January 31 as Lou Roe had 21 points. The Bonnies are 0-12 in the A-10 and 10-14 overall.

Mountaineers run past Minutemen

2nd half surge buries UMass 79-54

by MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

MORGANTOWN, W.Va. — West Virginia University, with a 49 point second half Saturday, postponed the struggling University of Massachusetts' basketball team's title hopes for at least another day by defeating the Minutemen 79-54.

The Minutemen saw a two-point halftime lead evaporate as the Mountaineers outplayed and outhustled UMass throughout the second half. During the decisive 19-7 run in which WVU went from down 32-30 to uo 49-39, the Mountaineers scored 12 points on breakaway dunks or layups.

"I wouldn't say it's time to panic, but we're not playing UMass basketball," said Minuteman guard Derek Kellogg. "It seemed like they were ready to play. Everybody is on their own track, we have to get back to playing as a team."

Never threatening in the second half, UMass instead facilitated West Virginia's tear by turning the ball over. Tied at 32 with 19:40 left in the game, three early West Virginia possessions indicated something was wrong with the Minutemen.

West Virginia's Marsalis Basey stole the ball from Kellogg and fed Pervires Greene for a slam dunk to put WVU up 34-32, a lead which was never surrendered. On the ensuing possession, Harper Williams' bad pass was stolen by Ricky Robinson, who dished to Tracy Shelton for another slam.

After Williams and Robinson traded baskets to make the score 38-35, the pesky Greene picked up Lou Roe's turnover and gave the ball up to Mike Boyd for the monster dunk that gave West Virginia a 40-35 lead. With a crowd of 10,236 behind the Mountaineers, they would solidify the lead by stifling UMass and scoring easy baskets.

"In the second half, every loose ball and shot, we went for it and made sure we got it," said WVU's Matt Roadcap. "Our guards' defense was incredible. They couldn't get the ball upcourt and when they got it upcourt, they wanted to get rid of it, they didn't want the ball."

"The dunks came after the turnovers," said WVU's Robinson, who was one of four Mountaineers in double figures. "I can't explain the [second-half] turn-around. All I know was we came out, turned on the defensive level and started crashing the boards.

"I wouldn't say we owed them one, but we felt we could've won the game up there (in Amherst), so we had to prove it to ourselves as well as other people in the league."

UMass could have clinched the Atlantic 10 regular season title with a victory, and the first seed in the A-10 tournament on Sunday that goes along with it. For nearly twenty minutes, it seemed as if they would finish the job. The Minutemen held as much as a six-point 20-14 lead during a first half which saw four lead changes.

Down 31-30 with 1.2 seconds left in the half, Roadcap attempted a desperation three-pointer which drew the front of the rim. Inexplicably, UMass forward Ted Cottrell tried to block the shot as it neared the rim. Although it appeared that Cottrell did not goaltend, WVU's coach Gale Catlett was livid and demanded the basket count. Instead the officials slapped Catlett with a technical foul which prompted fans to throw 10-20 items on the court.

Instead of buoying the Minutemen, the technical seemed to rev up the Mountaineers and their fans for the second half, where they exacted revenge.

JOSH REYNOLDS / COLLEGIAN
Loe Roe and the UMass Minutemen fell to West Virginia on Saturday 79-54.

"I was a little disappointed, a little discouraged at halftime," said Catlett, who logged his 300th victory at WVU. "I still had visions of grandeur at the half, but I wasn't as enthusiastic as I was before the game.

"The guys really wanted this badly. That's a heckuva win."

"They're not playing hard," said UMass head coach John Calipari of his team. "There's nothing I can do for them. We had great practices, this is on them now. We (the coaches) challenged them, they responded in practice and then came out and played the way they did today.

"We'll be all right, or our season will end quickly, one of the two.

West Virginia U. is back in the hunt

By ARTHUR STAPLETON

MORGANTOWN, W. Va. — When a team is picked to win a conference in the preseason, the expectations of that club rise immediately.

This is the case of for the West Virginia men's basketball team, whose 1992-93 season has been frustrating thus far after being chosen in the preseason to finish first in the Atlantic 10 by the coaches and the media. Coach Gale Catlett's team has spent most of this season hovering near the .500 mark overall and of only perennial A-10 doormat St. Bonaventure in the Atlantic 10.

The squad has not had much to chear about, suffering through injuries and a plain case of underachieving, until last Saturday, when the Mountaineers defeated the first place and defending A-10 champion Massachusetts, 79-54.

Led by a dominating performance by Pervires Greene (25 points) and a thundering crowd at the WVU Coliseum, the Mountaineers established themselves once again as a threat in the A-10 tournament, which starts next Sunday. The victory puts West Virginia at 5-7 in the conference, still in a battle for possibly the fourth seed in the tourney, a spot which seemed out of reach earlier in the month.

Many had written off the Mountaineers when it came to challenging the top of the league in the tournament. West Virginia is winless on the road all year, and has yet to bee 100 percent healthy, according to coach Catlett. However, after Saturday's game, UMass assistant coach James "Bruiser" Flint said he never counted them out.

"You can't count 'em out. That's why when we talk about the quarterfinals [in the A-10's], every game is going to be tough, because every team is tough, an hey, they wanted it more than us," said Flint.

The Mountaineers possessed too much depth on the frontline, as Greene, juniors Ricky Robinson (15 points, eight rebounds) and Phil Wilson (four points, seven rebounds), and seniors Matt Roadcap (four points, five rebounds) and Jeremy Bodkin (two points, one rebound) played over 15 minutes a piece, to only four UMass players above that mark.

Because of that depth, Catlett said, West Virginia, unlike the Minutemen, never got in foul trouble.

"When you've got a Wilson, a Roadcap, a Bodkin — the big guys to rotate along with Robinson and Greene, it doesn't really make a difference how you spread your fouls, because you have so many big guys," said Catlett.

Heading into tonight's crucial game with Temple, the Mountaineers have won four of their last six, and it appears as they become more healthy, they are becoming more dangerous.

Lady Knights beat Minutewomen

By JEFF HOJLO

Usually when a basketball team shoots over 50 percent during a game, they have a very good chance to win.

Unfortunately for the University of Massachusetts women's basketball squad, this adage didn't quite prove true Saturday in Piscataway, New Jersey, as they shot a torrid 63.6% in the second half (53.6% game) but still lost to first place Rutgers, 71-63.

UMass played sloppily throughout the contest, turning the ball over a whopping 34 times but poor shooting by the Lady Knights (34.4% game) kept Minutewomen in the game to the end.

Freshman phenomenon Melissa Gurile played impressively on the offensive end of the floor with 18 points and 10 rebounds and also showed she's no slouch on the defensive end by rejecting four Rutger's shots.

But her efforts, as well as those by Octavia Thomas (15 pts, eight rebs) went for naught as Rutger's C'ta Mitchelson scored 14 points and teammates Caroline DeRoose and Regina Kalucki added 13 and 12 points respectively. Mitchelson also snagged nine rebounds (five offensive) to help seal her team's victory down the stretch.

UMass trailed by only six at the half (28-22) and Rutgers (18-7 overall, 12-1 Atlantic-10) looked to be on their heels. But the Lady Knights came out of the locker room determined not to relinquish their lead, and they never did.

HOOP NOTES: On a more positive note, Octavia Thomas captured Rookie of the Week honors for the third time this season. Thomas shot a blistering 76.5% from the field in losses against St. Joseph's (17 pts) and Rutger's (five steals). The 5-8 forward from Our Lady of Good Counsel High in Newark, NJ currently ranks 14th in the A-10 in scoring with a 12.9 average and seems to improve her chances of being a lottery pick every time she steps on the hardwood . . . Senior Kim Kristofik played well again, scoring 10 pts. (eight for 10 from the free-throw line) and crashing the boards for six rebs in Saturday's game . . . Rutger's clinched the regular season Atlantic-10 title with Saturday's victory over Coach Joanie O'Brien and company . . . frosh Kim Gregory had a team high four assists against the Lady Knights . . . UMass's last home game of the season will take place against non-conference foe Boston University 7:00 p.m. Tuesday night at the Curry Hicks Cage . . . their last game of the regular season against the University of Rhode Island will have strong implications for the post-season. A win for the Minutewomen could mean a higher seed in the A-10 tournament.

Women discuss relationships

Women's Conference incorporates diverse perspectives

By MELANIE DESILVA

Editor's note: This article is part of ongoing coverage of the Feb. 27 Women's Conference which will appear throughout the week. A related article appears on page 3.

Sharing personal experience and academic knowledge, four women discussed their relationships as part of Saturday's 1993 Women's Conference.

The seminar, "Women and Their Relationships," attended by approximately 60 people, presented the audience with distinct perspectives on love, family conflict, women's psychology and the quest for autonomy.

Linda Miller, a program administrator for United Technologies Corporation, shared the conflicts she has faced as a woman in a predominantly male sector of the economy.

Conveying the difference between male and female forms of communication within the office, she explained the power relations involved in working for a man as opposed to a woman.

Miller said when she began having lunch with secretaries, who comprised most of the women working at the corporation, her boss quickly intervened.

"You don't want to have lunch with the secretaries if you are concerned with your career," Miller was told.

According to Miller, her female supervisors have been more sensitive to women's issues, like pregnancy and more willing to pursue a friendship outside of the office.

As a bisexual woman in a committed lesbian relationship, Liza Weinmester Rozas, a residential director at UMass, said she has struggled to gain the acceptance of her conservative, Hispanic family and friends.

In denying her sexuality and her partner, Rozas said family members attempted to "set her up with a good-

A panel of four professional women warned against internalizing male opinions while working in traditionally male- dominated fields in a discussion Saturday.

Jeannette Lazarus, a former construction worker who now works as a unionist painter, said after throwing her husband out 17 years ago she was forced to take any work she could to support herself and four children.

"It is difficult not to internalize what they think about you," Lazarus said. "You don't have to be careful physically anymore. They don't have that right. But emotionally what they say still hurts."

Group seeks tax dollars for elections

By MICHAEL WEBBER
Collegian Staff

Members of a local political group traveled to Boston yesterday to argue their case for using tax money to fund state political campaigns.

Four representatives of the Pioneer Valley Pro-Democracy Campaign, an Amherst-based group dedicated to ending the influence of private funding on political campaigns, went to the State House to explain the "why, what and the how" of their plan to the Massachusetts Election Laws Committee, Campaign member Dennis Kelly said.

The Pro-Democracy Campaign has drafted a bill proposing the dispensing of public funds to candidates for state offices who have demonstrated their viability by acquiring an established number of five-dollar "qualifying contributions." The number of contributions required depends on the office being sought.

Kelly said public funding would be on a voluntary basis, and candidates could still run using private funds. However, the proposed bill would provide additional state funds for publicly-funded candidates if their privately-funded opponents spent excessive amounts.

Kelly said he felt those who did choose to run privately-funded campaigns would be at a disadvantage because of "a stigma the public would perceive."

State Sen. Stanley Rosenberg said the Election Laws Committee, which he chairs, is presently considering both the Pro-Democracy Campaign's proposal and a proposal from the Massachusetts Common Cause organization, which is also designed to reduce the influence of contributions from private businesses and individuals on political campaigns.

Kelly said his group's proposal is distinct because it offers full public funding to all qualifying candidates, while the Common Cause plan "only tinkers with the existing system," by providing partial funding and limited restrictions on spending.

After the five-hour hearing to discuss the proposals, which was attended by numerous state legislators and Gov. Weld, Rosenberg said the attitude towards public campaign financing was very positive, but also cautious.

"There was a very strong sense that we had to

O'Brien tests support for proposed ban

By VANESSA ADELMAN
Collegian Correspondent

Chancellor Richard O'Brien is consulting with several constituencies about a policy to establish a smoke-free campus, which he said if approved will be implemented in anywhere from a few weeks to two months.

The policy was recommended and approved by the Faculty Senate on Feb. 18, and now O'Brien will make the decision on when it will be put into effect.

"I have to work with various organizations to check on how wide the support is," O'Brien said.

The proposed policy would allow smoking only in designated guest rooms at the Campus Center hotel, and certain University-owned and leased individual rooms and apartments, including Residence Halls in accordance with policy established by Housing Services, the Faculty Senate's report said.

Some of the organizations O'Brien will work with are undergraduate and graduate students, and the University Staff Association, which is a union for campus employees. The University has an agreement with the Staff Association that it will provide smoking areas on campus.

"The establishment of the policy depends on formal bargaining with the Union," O'Brien said. "If they approve it right away, then the policy can be implemented within a few weeks."

According to John Cunningham, chairperson of the University Health Council, the Faculty Senate approved the policy because recent medical findings by the Environmental Protection Agency have declared secondhand smoke a Class A carcinogen which is in the same category as asbestos, radon and benzene.

"I don't oppose the idea," said Sylvia, a clerk at the School of Agriculture who declined to give her last name, "but I don't want it to go through because I smoke."

Conference supports environmental activism

By MARIE KALLINER
Collegian Correspondent

Students have the potential to effect great social and political change through activism, according to a number of speakers at this weekend's Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group Conference.

MassPIRG's fourteenth annual Student Conference was attended by students from 27 college campuses around the state who gathered for a weekend to celebrate the work and accomplishments of MASSPIRG, and guest speakers lectured on the importance of continuing the work that the organization is doing.

Vice-Chancellor for Student Affairs Tom Robinson led off the weekend on Friday night in his address to the students. Robinson spoke about the importance of student activity for MassPIRG, and offered encouragement to listeners.

A former member of MontanaPIRG, Robinson said he knows first- hand the work and nature of PIRGs' quest to fight social and environmental problems.

State Sen. David Magnani, chairperson of the Joint Committee on Education for Massachusetts and a UMass alumni, addressed students on Saturday.

"I am a strong supporter of students' rights and the work that MassPIRG is doing," he said. Magnani also expressed his concerns about some social problems facing today's younger generation — poverty, problems with the public educational facilities in the U.S., and political problems such as campaign finance.

Magnani advised students to "know your belief system and stand up for what you believe" no matter what the obstacles are.

U.S. Rep. John Oliver also spoke to MassPIRG activists about the importance of the work that they are doing. His focus of discussion lay primarily on political and environmental issues.

"All of us bear the burden of environmental irresponsibility, to some degree. If we don't recognize this burden, we're in deep [expletive] indeed," he advised listeners.

Recent incidents recorded by the University's Department of Public Safety.

Larceny/Motor Vehicle Theft

• An individual reported that a window was smashed and the stereo on his vehicle parked on Sylvan Drive Thursday night. He reported to police that he had seen 3 males in the vicinity of another vehicle in Lot 44. A check revealed that vehicle was stolen out of West Springfield.

Police discovered the second vehicle on Sylvan Drive Thursday night with the ignition popped and the vehicle engine still warm. The vehicle was confirmed stolen from West Springfield and the owner was notified.

Accident-Property Damage

• Friday night a vehicle in Lot 40 collided with another vehicle while backing up. The operator was cited for failure to use care in backing. Estimated damage was $1200.

Burglary/Breaking and Entering

• Saturday afternoon an individual reported a window smashed on her vehicle in Lot 44. Her stereo system was stolen. The stereo was valued at $750.

• Sunday afternoon an individual reported his vehicle on University Drive broken into. His portable compact disc player, assorted cassettes and a radar detector were stolen. The goods were valued at $450.

Many students and employees at the University will be affected by the policy, but O'Brien said he will try to take everyone's opinion into account.

"I'm a non-smoker and I support a smoker's right to smoke," Gerald McMahon, a sophomore psychology major, said. "The whole point of a smoking section is don't sit in it if you don't want to be exposed to smoke."

According to O'Brien, there has been no formal opposition to the policy. He added that formal complaints can be sent to his office for consideraton.

O'Brien said he has not thought through how to go about enforcing the policy beyond the traditional "warning" for the first violation. After that the penalty would escalate, but O'Brien did not specify how this would occur.

"I think the biggest problem will be enforcement," Molly Millet, a freshman political science major, said. "Like she said in Basic Instinct, 'What are you going to do? Arrest me for smoking?'"

Physical Plant unveils plans to alter campus

By DANIEL BOUCHER
Collegian Correspondent

Physical Plant supervisors have established a two-stage plan to redesign the grounds between Hasbrouck, the Campus Center and Goessmann. The plan's purpose, they say, is to beautify the area and improve its safety for pedestrians.

Designed by the Worcester-based BSC Group and approved by the Physical Plant's Division of Planning and Facilities Development, the plan calls for building a new road on the north side of Hasbrouck which would allow service vehicles access to Hasbrouck, but restrict them from driving all the way behind behind the building.

It would instead force them to turn around and drive out the same curb path they enter.

The new design will also forbid vehicles from driving straight from Goessmann or Lederle to Hasbrouck or the Campus Center. A separate access route will be constructed from North Pleasant Street to behind West Experiment Station and Goessmann.

The project's manager, Niraj Dangoria, said emergency vehicles will still be able to access the central area if necessary.

A copy of the Physical Plant's plans to revamp the area around Hasbrouck. ARAM COMJEAN / COLLEGIAN

Dangoria told representatives from affected buildings and university services at a meeting yesterday that the project originated from the decision to construct a new, underground, concrete steam trench in the area.

He said Director of Operations Patrick S. Daly involved the Planning department in redesigning the area since it would have to be dug up anyway.

The project is special, said Dangoria, because "never before has the planning division been involved in any maintenance project to get something better."

The combined cost of stage one, involving the steam trench and the new roads, will be between $250,000 and $300,000, Dangoria said.

The second stage of the project, which will consist of relandscaping the area, will cost between $215,000 and $260,000, but designs still have to still be finalized, Dangoria said. In general, the area will be replanted, repaved and connected to a new lighting system which will be more efficient.

Because phase one will be completed during the summer, Dangoria said he does not expect it to cause problems for students. Phase two however, will be conducted during the fall. Students may have to walk around the construction area, which, Dangoria said, will probably be done section by section.

"We will do whatever we need to minimalize disruption of student life," he said.

The concrete wall between the Campus Center and Hasbrouck will also be removed as part of the second stage. Dangoria said the Planning department is working with the Arts Council and the artist who created the wall's mural to move it to another location which has yet to be determined. The land will gradually slope up to Hasbrouck, with solid granite blocks as support.

Dangoria said the mural was being moved because it "has really taken a beating from the natural elements."

Although Bud Wilkes, the associate director of the Campus Center, expressed concerns about guest access to the Campus Center Hotel, building and service administrators who attended the meeting yesterday generally reacted favorably to the first stage of the plan.

Official calls European environment a 'success'

By KELLY SPANG
Collegian Staff

Anthony Brenton, the former head of the Department of the Environment for Science and Energy at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office in the United Kingdom, spoke last Thursday at UMass about the European approach to international environmental issues.

After World War II, European countries joined together initially to merge "war-making parts" of their economy. Brenton explained these were coal, steel and later nuclear capabilities.

Today, 12 European countries have united to merge their economies as a whole and deal with international issues such as the environment.

Europe, according to Brenton, did not believe the environment was a "moral issue." Rather, "it is natural for the community to take a hand in dealing with environmental issues," he explained.

"We have a lot of natural concerns," Brenton said. The problems Europe faces are also international concerns such as resource depletion, population growth and forest destruction.

One of the most important things in dealing with the environment in the European community was the need for uniformed product standards, such as noise standards for aircraft. Brenton said it is a problem if one country's standards and regulations are different than other country in the community.

The European approach to the environment is a "success story" according to Brenton, even though there have been some difficulties in agreement.

"National divisions, suspicions and differences," Brenton said, "remain very strong and threaten any agreements."

Among the major successes Brenton discussed were the reduction of car emissions, reducing acid rain, agreeing on radioactive contamination standards and protecting wildlife.

The main problems the European community is concerned with now are global problems such as the ozone layer and the climate, Brenton said.

"We have to work together," Brenton explained, "to get chemicals out of the environment."

Since pre-industrial times, the world has increased carbon dioxide emissions by 25 percent, contributing to global warming.

Environmental conferences, such as the Rio Conference, an international conference which addressed important environmental concerns, are steps in the right direction towards cleaning up our environment.

Brenton said he believes Rio especially is a "symbol of hope for the future."

Olver also encouraged today's generation to "actively fight to protect our environment." As he concluded his speech, he told MassPIRG members that "My generation is going to give you a rite of inheritance. . . Your voice is an important one in the political and enviornmental dialogue."

Janet Domenitz, executive director of MassPIRG, was the weekend's keynote speaker. She lectured on the "need for activism and social change." Domenitz added that "students have to redefine the future. they have a responsibility and an obligation to make a change."

She added that "PIRG is an organization devoted to its student base. We strive to attain insider and outsider strategies to go about our plan to change social problems."

"I don't leave my fate to the politicians," she said. "It's impotant to be critical of ever of politicians and that they stand by their promises."

Erica Craven, a senior social thought and political economy major at UMass, commented that "it was nice to see so many students across the state who work together. The power that we have is so great. We can really affect change."

"It was wonderful to learn that there are so many people in this state who are idealists, who want to make the world better. You can build up a force, a coalition," said Sharron Tetrault of Framinham State College.

Bezanson Hall closed

Damages from burst pipe cause odor

By FRANCIS ZERA
Collegian Staff

Despite earlier estimates that the Bezanson Recital Hall would be operational last weekend, the performance hall remains closed because of water damage resulting from a burst pipe early Friday morning, according to University spokesperson Karin Sherbin.

Bezanson Hall remains closed chiefly due to a strong "musty odor," possibly caused by mold, that permeates the hall, Music Department Chairperson Ernest May said.

There are two pianos in Bezanson, one of which sustained no damage, and the other was partially damaged. There is no damage estimate for the organ yet, which is still too wet to be inspected, May said.

According to May, the secretarial staff in the area affected by the flood had been sent home early on Thursday due to a failure in the heating system. Temperatures in the nearby music department offices also dropped to sixty degrees, but staff remained throughout the day.

A total figure for damages is still unavailable due to the uncertainty of the extent of the necessary repairs. There is a possibility that the carpeting and upholstery may have to be replaced, May said.

The hall will be closed for the remainder of the week, according to Marilyn Kushick, the music department's publicist. Two recitals have been cancelled and classes that were scheduled to be held in the hall are being relocated until repairs are completed, she said.

"We hope that by next week we will have a regular schedule of events at the recital hall," she said.

May said the Fine Arts Center staff was used to leaks and that "water marks don't bother us."

May said he hoped that the flood would inspire Physical Plant to initiate a more aggressive preventative maintenance program to forestall future mishaps.

Davis urges 'rethinking' of feminism

By JULIE OLSON
Collegian Correspondent

Urging women to use the 1993 Women's Conference as a "springboard to some kind of action," activist, lecturer and college professor Angela Y. Davis delivered the keynote address on Saturday morning for the 1993 Women's Conference in the Campus Center.

The theme of this year's conference was "Empowering Women: Prospects and Challenges for the 21st Century."

Standing in front of a banner bearing the images of such women as Golda Meir, Ida B. Wells, Indira Gandhi and Emma Goldman, Davis told the capacity crowd, "if we wish to map out some of the challenges of the 21st century, we're going to have to rethink the ways in which we conceptualize the women's movement."

According to Davis, the traditional idea of feminism is a myth. Therefore, the idea that all women are working together to overturn male oppression and sexism is a misleading and singular assumption which is hindering the progression of women's issues all over the world, she said.

"There is no such thing as authentic feminism," Davis said.

A large contributing factor to this situation is the way the average person views "women," Davis said. There are women struggling all over the world, involved in conflicts which the average American doesn't hear about in the traditional media, according to Davis.

"Are they less important because we don't know about them?" she asked the audience. "We have no right to assume

High Court set to rule on sexual harassment

By RICHARD CARELLI
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court set the stage for a key ruling on sexual harassment on the job as it agreed today to decide whether workers who sue must prove they suffered "severe psychological injury."

The justices said they will review a case from Nashville, Tenn., in which lower courts threw out a women's lawsuit because she was only offended, not psychologically scarred, by her boss' crude conduct.

The court's decision, expected in 1994, will clarify the definition of illegal sexual harassment, which is banned by a federal law called Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Teresa Harris worked as a rental manager at Forklift Systems Inc. in Nashville for over two years before she quit in Oct. 1987.

She then sued Forklift's president, Charles Hardy, over alleged sexual harassment.

Hardy repeatedly engaged in what a federal judge said was "sex-based derogatory conduct toward Ms. Harris."

Her lawsuit said Hardy made sexual comments about her clothing, asked her to retrieve coins from his front pocket, threw coins on the floor and asked her to bend down and retrieve them, and once told her, "You're a woman, what do you know?"

Hardy also was accused of once saying to Ms. Harris, "Let's go to the Holiday Inn to negotiate your raise," but lower courts concluded that Ms. Harris knew the comment was meant as a joke and took it as such at the time.

Hardy did not deny most of the conduct alleged.

"I believe that Hardy is a vulgar man and demeans the female employees at his workplace," U.S. Magistrate Ken Sandidge III said when recommending in 1990 that Ms. Harris' suit dismissed.

But he added that Ms. Harris had not proved that Hardy's conduct made Forklift Systems a "hostile work environment," or that his conduct and words were "so severe as to be expected to seriously affect [her] psychological well-being."

"A reasonable woman manager under like circumstances would have been offended by Hardy, but his conduct would not have risen to the level of interfering with that person's work performance," the magistrate said.

Based on that recommendation, U.S District Judge John T. Nixon threw out Ms. Harris' suit. The dismissal was upheld by the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals last September.

In the appeal acted on today, Ms. Harris argues Hardy's conduct should be ruled illegal.

move to a system of full public financing, but that most people believed that it had to be done incrementally, that is, we have to do something like the Common Cause bill first, and then move to something like what the Pro-Democracy folks want," Rosenberg said.

Rosenberg said the Pro-Democracy Campaign estimated the cost of its proposal at $23 million, while the Common Cause plan figures on $14 million. He said he was suspicious of the estimates because the difference in cost of the proposals was "relatively small," while the difference in scope was quite large.

Kelly said he was encouraged by the hearing, and that his organization had "planted some good seeds."

According to Rosenberg, the idea of publicly financing campaigns is nothing new. He said a man who testified at the hearing yesterday referred to a bill he filed to limit candidate spending and provide full public financing in 1967.

Candidate Forum

Editor's note: This is the second of a series of editorials written by candidates for the upcoming Student Government Association election March 9 and 10.

UMass is going through changes that will have long term effects on the future of this university and its students. We have just hired a new vice chancellor and are presently searching for a new chancellor. We have completed construction of the Mullins Center. Most importantly, the four-year trend of budget cuts seems to be coming to an end. How will these changes affect our tuition? What kind of access will students have to the decision-making process? Why are we the second most expensive state school in the country? These questions must be asked and answered.

Al
LIZANA

We need to make the administration understand that each student is more than an ID number. We have all struggled to get to this university one way or another. The students of UMass need a strong student advocate to keep us informed and empowered. I am confident in my ability to fulfill this role. I have always been a leader and I am not afraid to stand up for others. My leadership experience began in high school when I was senior class president. I was also president of Brothers Sisters United, a community service organization. Working with such groups as ARISE for Social Justice, we helped educate, organize and empower low-income people to learn about and obtain their rights. Since 1989, I have been a member of the Massachusetts Army National Guard.

My first semester at UMass I continued to remain very much involved. I joined ROTC, where I learned even more about organizing and leadership. I became vice president of the Afrik-Am Society for a year and was later elected vice president of the Black Student Union. I interned an entire semester as a legal assistant at the Legal Service Center where I worked as a councilor and an advocate for the protection of student rights.

At the climax of last semester's racial tensions, I was one of the key student negotiators responsible for bringing about a concrete and legally binding agreement between students and the administration. After meeting with student representatives, the UMass president, the chancellor, the vice chancellor of student affairs, the provost, the dean of students and the department of justice all sitting down at the negotiating table, we pressured the administration into compliance with our demands. We went to bat for students in a game of hardball and we won.

My leadership experience has helped me to develop a thorough understanding of this university which is essential in maneuvering our student voice throughout the miles of bureaucratic red tape.

I have a vision for this university similar to that of most every student. If we could change UMass with the snap of a finger, tuition would be more affordable, financial aid would be plentiful, the administration would be more responsive to students' needs, Housing and Health Services would be more efficient, RSOs would be better funded, we would get discounts on Mullins Center events, men's and women's sports would be equally funded and the campus climate would be more inclusive, unified and friendly to cultural exchange. A finger snap won't make it happen but dedicated students can make this vision a reality.

Our voice can and will be heard. We have a two-day window of opportunity that could bring a one step closer to the quality university we want and deserve. We must have the courage to vote for the most qualified candidate for student trustee. Al Lizana is that candidate.

Al Lizana is an undergraduate candidate for the office of student trustee.

Can you spare $1,000?

Kids his age spend most of their time playing baseball or Nintendo, but Larry Villella isn't like most 14-year-olds.

Last Monday he sent a $1,000 check to President Clinton. No, Larry isn't a lobbyist — he sent the president money to help pay off the deficit. He took the president's challenge to heart, and sacrificed.

RIVERA

Like you, I wondered where this kid got so much money. Larry is sort of an entrepreneur — he founded his own company, which markets a tree- and shrub-watering system he invented. Larry decided to do something about the deficit. Even at 14 he knows how bad things are and how bad things can get if something isn't done.

"The government has been careless," the teenager told me from his Fargo, N.D. home. "We have nothing else to do but sacrifice and work together."

Wise words from someone so young. How many of us would send $1,000 to Washington? How many of us have $1,000?

The last several days have been more than just a little exciting for Larry. He received a call from President Clinton thanking him for his donation to the United States.

"He called me from Air Force One, and I was really nervous, but then I relaxed and told him how to spend the money," he said.

Larry proceeded to lay out his plan. The president had two options: put the money towards the deficit or help fund several programs — AIDS research, health care and education were only a few he could remember.

The excitement didn't stop there: Larry and his parents were whisked off to New York City to appear on the Phil Donahue Show. "We stayed at a really nice hotel called the Drake," he said, "but everything was really expensive — a soda cost $2.75."

He may be from North Dakota but he knows a rip-off when he sees it. Welcome to New York, kid.

Not only has he a knack for business but also honesty. Larry said Phil was a "really neat guy" but on the air he said he acts like a jerk.

While in New York the excitement continued. Bill Cosby got wind of this and was so impressed that he gave Larry $2,000 for his future college education.

Wait a minute! This kid gives away a thousand bucks and he gets two in return? Only in America.

When asked about future plans, he said the business has nothing to do with them, because of a sick family member.

"When I was five, my cousin had heart surgery and ever since then I wanted to be a cardiologist."

Times have changed — when I was 14 all I wanted to be was Luke Skywalker.

Larry was cutting school on this day; he needed to "field phone calls from the media," and "settle some business matters" he has neglected since this whole adventure started.

"I missed some school but I should be able to make it up," he said. "I get straight A's."

While uptown the other night I thought of Larry. I was digging in my pockets looking for enough money to buy a slice of pizza. All I had were two old lint-covered Life Savers, 25 cents and Larry's North Dakota phone number. What would you do when faced with starvation?

"Hello, Larry — It's your good pal Dave. . ."

Having children is a privilege

It is not anybody's natural right to have a child. I cannot agree with an editorial stating otherwise, [Collegian, Feb. 23] though I agree sterilization is inhumane. As mentioned, "it takes two to tango," implying a shared right and much more importantly a shared responsibility.

How can people who can't control their own sex lives conceive of having a child? They have no right to expect anyone other than themselves to provide for that child — it is only the public's charity which allows them this luxury. Contraception is readily available. Many manage active sex lives without having children.

Why should some be allowed to neglect their responsibilities while most manage to control themselves? This inherent lack of responsibility is further highlighted by how few of these couples remain together.

It is unconscionable to have unprotected sex that could lead to children without feeling commitment to the other person. Only a cruelly selfish person would risk bringing a baby into this world without having absolute faith in their partner's and their own commitment to their child's future.

I cannot believe having a child is a right. It is a privilege. Children deserve many things out of life and I don't believe all people can provide these. Many people have children before they are ready. What kind of life does this leave child or parent?

It is in the best interests of both the would-be parents and children that pregnancy only takes place when desired, not by accident.

It's un-American to remain silent

If you are a UMass student, chances are you have heard a group of people, remarkably dominated by White men, complain and whine about those "boisterous" minorities. If not, look back to Greg Sukiennik's editorial [Collegian, Feb. 25].

Proponents of this stereotype would be content if minorities and women simply accepted being brutalized on a daily basis. As Mr. Sukiennik states, "Being American is about being, at some point, oppressed." Well, you'll have to excuse me, Mr. Sukiennik, because I do not want to settle for cultural mediocrity.

People do not have to roll up their sleeves, work with what has been dealt to them and toil until their grandchildren have enough to survive. To accept oppression as a necessary part of life is not only foolish, but stands opposed to every standard of perseverance. It would be un-American to remain silent.

Advocates of this "lift as you climb" theory of working and keeping quiet do not understand that minorities and women are not going to cease in demanding justice. This stereotype of the "whining minorities" attempts to stifle progress in American society. Working through hard times and making social sacrifices to benefit your grandchildren is only one form of progress.

Challenging the government for better health care or for civil rights legislation is not whining but work, hard and time-consuming, which benefits all Americans. Talking about racism or hate is not whining, but a discourse America desperately needs.

The belief that minorities and women don't work and are asking for "handouts" is a stereotype. The majority of people on welfare are single White women, and most are on relief for less than two years. Most Americans must work extremely hard to simply survive.

If you are one of those people who ascribe to the "whining minority" theory, and are tired of the "whining," then get up off your apathetic butt and do something to change this country. Of course, you could cover your ears and pretend that there are not problems to fight. However, I leave you with this thought: over 80 percent of the world population is non-WASP. Very soon America's population will largely be non-WASP. If you do not like the sound around you now, too bad, because it's only going to get louder.

An average, ordinary day in the life of a college woman

6:00 a.m. Alarm rings — this is definitely an ungodly hour! Hit snooze eight times, and watch as my roomies get a tad annoyed. One gets kind of volatile so I promise her that if I ever do it again Don Sweeney will marry her.

8:30 a.m. Meet male friend so we can walk to our exam together. Tell him that we had a sorority function last night but that I didn't go because I had to study. He makes rude comment like, "Oh, bet a lot of guys got 'play' last night."

10:15 a.m. Come to Campus Center to get breakfast. Listen while "coffee shop lady" tells me that I am ineligible for a student discount because I don't have my I.D. on me. Apparently despite my flannel shirt, pajama bottoms, baseball cap and knapsack filled with books I'll never open (just kidding, Mom!), I still don't resemble a student. I decide that this lady is from planet Zorcon!

11:15 a.m. Attend class where professor speaks about sex and sexuality. Girls listen and take notes, the guys make disparaging comments about girls and sex.

12:10 p.m. Walk home to get lunch, relate story about coffee shop lady, another roomie tells me that today I look like an ex-con, and that she can understand the mistake.

12:30 p.m. Walk uptown with a friend. Some gross guy yells obscenities at us, we ignore him. What a jerk!

1:30 p.m. We decide to go for a bite to eat. Guy behind the counter leers at my friend — we decide to go somewhere else to eat. This guy is too gross to even touch our food.

Stephanie EISENBERG

6:00 p.m. Go to see a movie. By the time we arrive the movie is sold out. My male friend tells me to flirt with the guy behind the counter to see if we can still get in. I refuse, we miss the movie.

6:30 p.m. Go back to that same friend's room and hang out with some other people. We start watching a made-for-TV movie. One scene shows a woman having flashbacks of being raped. A male friend yells out, "Wahoo — she's getting it and getting it good! Best damn sex she's ever had!"

7:00 p.m. Go home.

8:00 p.m. Decide to procrastinate studying and reread my Where's Dan Quayle? book. I'm getting pretty good, I can find him every time. It's easy to find him now in real life too. He got so good at saying, "D'ya want fries with that?" that he is now in charge of the McFry-o-later!

9:00 p.m. Pick out a nice outfit for the next day, so I won't be taken for an ex-con!

11:00 p.m. Take a quick break from studying to watch the news. Notice that yet another abortion clinic has been blocked, in some stupid conservative state.

12:30 p.m. Hang up the phone, and uselessly protest the tauntings that the "damn thing is glued to my ear." Crawl into bed, cuddle with Reggie, my teddy bear, and wonder if Dan Quayle will ever make employee of the month!

This is an average day in my life. Unfortunately, although I lead a happy, well-balanced life style, it is still filled with things that I'm trying to change. Almost everyday myself and many other women face harassment, discrimination and degradation. It is scary that these things have become so integrated in our daily life, that we tend to view them as normal. If we accept this, what next?

superiority (regarding) women in the Third World. How do we begin to rethink global feminism in a way that does not define the significance or importance of a movement in relation to our knowledge of it?"

In her closing remarks, Davis asked the crowd to begin the conference by shedding both the apathy and the biases that she felt were likely to be present.

In addition to appealing to the audience to not use the meetings merely as a place for discussion, but "as a springboard to some kind of action," she challenged the conference members to think about their roles as political agents.

"Ask yourselves what you are going to do to participate in some collective effort to engage in progressive, transformative — some may say 'radical,' 'revolutionary,' or even 'anti-imperialist' action," Davis said.

"That's the only way in which we are going to move into the next century."

County officials praise Clinton's economic plan

By HARRY ROSENTHAL
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The National Association of Counties announced "strong support" for Clinton's economic plan today and urged Congress to move quickly to provide financing for it.

The plan "provides the necessary sparks to ignite our struggling economy, as well as fostering long-term growth," said John H. Stroger, Jr., the president of the association composed of county officials nationwide.

The centerpiece of Clinton's proposal is an additional $16 billion in spending on infrastructure and programs assisting the needy.

The association said Congress should move quickly to provide:

- $4 billion for transportation — highways, bridges, transit, rail and airports;
- $2.5 billion for community development block grants; and
- $1 billion for summer youth jobs.

Transportation Secretary Federico Pena told the association's annual legislative conference today that the country is in for more serious unemployment problems unless Clinton's economic proposals are adopted.

"This recovery we are going through, while having some positive economic indicators, is not putting people back to work," Pena said.

"There are millions and millions who are currently unemployed and we are going to see others who are going to be unemployed in the very near future."

Pena warned that announcements of layoffs made by major corporations in the last couple of years — including Defense Department cuts of the last couple of years — have not been felt yet.

looking guy," while old friends often tell her she has been associating with gays and lesbians too much.

Yet, despite the disapproval of her mother, in particular, Rozas said she is happy in her relationship.

"Intimacy," she said, "has been most successful with women."

Andrea Kandel, also a bisexual woman, and the executive director for the National Conference, discussed her long-term lesbian relationship and the methods she and her partner employ to maintain good communication.

Kandel said being raised Jewish, family had always been important to her. As a child, she "dreamed about her wedding." Yet when her and her partner decided to make a commitment, she said she saw no reason why she had to abandon the idea of having a wedding.

To show their love and ask for support from family and friends, they held a "celebration of commitment."

According to Lynette Bloise, a psychiatric social worker at the University Mental Health Center, as women "we must eliminate labels, or we will continue to be prisoners of reality. You must go beyond what is expected of you."

Nine years ago, Bloise and her three children got on a plane to leave behind a "a life that was full of tears."

Encouraged by her sister, who lives in Amherst, and inspired by her mother, she abandoned her "sociality determined" life role to pursue her dreams.

Although leaving her family in Puerto Rico was difficult, Bloise stressed the need for women to strive towards autonomy. "What matters is that we are in touch with who we are," she said.

Kathleen Shanahan, the only speaker to provide an exclusively academic perspective, discussed the difference between male and female communication and the importance for women to cherish and expand the communal connectedness shared between them.

According to Shanahan, traditional psychology "ignores women's experiences," defining what is normal through analyzing only the behavior of men.

While Freud believed "women were best understood as castrated men," Shanahan said, stages of ethical development labeled women's "moral reasoning" as "inferior."

According to Shanahan, women generate a unique network of connectedness with other women, which is a crucial aspect of their power. "As women, our relationships continue to be our most valuable strength and resource," Shanahan said.

Lazarus said male co-workers could not always identify why they hated her. She said their hatred was demonstrated when she found pornography taped to her locker.

"I don't want them to think of me as a man or woman, just a painter. I want them only to see the paint brush extended from my hand," Lazarus said.

Detective Joanne O'Connor started at the University of Massachusetts Police Department in 1984 and has since achieved the position of detective for sexual assault cases. She said encountering sexism at the police academy did not deter her from graduating second in her class.

"The academy was run by ex-marine officers and they made my life a living hell," O'Connor said. "They blamed everything on me, saying that it was because of me if everyone had to run extra."

O'Connor said it is necessary to work around chauvinism because a woman cannot change that attitude, but she can prove it wrong.

According to O'Connor, the sexism did not stop after the academy.

"Some officers make no bones about how they feel about me. But I am where I am because I worked hard at it. They are where they are because they didn't," O'Connor said.

Dr. Judy Toyama, assistant graduate dean said, "We will know that women have really made it when they hire as many incompetent women as they do men."

Toyama started at UMass as an assistant professor of sports studies and cited sexist statements she has heard from students.

"In answer to one of my exam questions, which read 'Will women ever beat men in sports, why or why not?' One man answered 'no' because God doesn't want it to be so," Toyama said.

She said she wants women to realize that in life, as in sports, people win only 50 percent of the time and that setbacks should not be internalized.

Ellen Story, state representative for the Third Hampshire District, spoke of the positives and negatives concerning women in the Massachusetts House of Representatives where women comprise only 23 percent of the legislature's lower house.

"We are over half the population and we have a long way to go to represent that in government," Story said.

Story added the number of women in the House has doubled in past decade and is at a present high of 36 of the 160 members.

"Feelings about women in government are changing," Story said. "It may be because the country is in such sorry shape that there is a new feeling that women should be given a chance."

Nora Malikin, an Amherst High School senior, worked on Story's campaign. While holding a sign for Story on the street, Malikin said she encountered male chauvinism from an opponent's sign holder.

"The man said Story was not going to win. We asked 'why not' and he answered 'because she is a woman,'" Malikin said.

Story won. Although Story, Toyama, O'Connor and Lazarus said they have all admittedly encountered male backlash in their work, they are still working.

"Don't alienate each other," O'Connor said. "Without each other we do not have anything."

HSCN airs timorous thrillers from its video vault

By EDWARD W. HUMPHRIES

Geena Davis stars as reporter Gale Gayley and Andy Garcia is the perfect hero, John Bubber in the contemporary comedy "Hero," airing on HSCN this week.

Welcome to the inaugural 1993 guide to the myriad of motion pictures that are headed to a television set near you, thanks to the mastery of the Housing Services Cable Network. For the weeks to come, I will serve as your tour guide to the cinematic selections to be found within the confines of this video vault. Hoping to avoid a Howard the Duck and always searching in vain for a Citizen Kane (or at least a Crying Game), my purpose is to inform you, the UMass community, on which movies to spend your valuable time on and which ones to avoid at all costs (like this week's Candyman). So without further ado, let me present this week's current slate of movies, which should run from Wednesday March 3 until March 10.

The Abyss Taking a cue from Nietzche, director James Cameron dives head first into this undersea adventure yarn that manages to combine the search for a dismantled nuclear sub, the patch-up of a battle weary marriage and a deep sea mining companies' close encounters of the aquatic kind. Given credible performances by Ed Harris and Mary Elizabeth Mastrantonio as the estranged couple struggling with their torn marriage as well as the ominous presence of a malevolent Navy SEAL squad, Cameron somehow makes it all piece together. Though the film's drama is watered-down in the final act with the discovery of the abyss's alien denizens, solid acting from the leads and from Cameron veteran Michael Biehn (Terminator, Aliens) keep this film from drowning in a sea of visual effects. B

Airplane One of the true comedy classics of our time, this Zucker Brother's ingenious sendup of airport disaster movies satisfied a parody starved early 80's audience and established the directors as America's predominant Sultans of Spoof. Leads Robert Hays and Julie Haggerty waltz through a cinematic cotillion of deadpan dialogue and bad puns galore with remarkable ease, sharing the screen with such eclectic casting choices as veteran character actors Peter Graves and Leslie Nielsen. As the antics continue and the sight gags mount, this film leaves in its wake an abundance of laughs. A-

Aliens This action-packed sequel to the 1979 sci-fi thriller reunites Chief Warrant Officer Ripley (Sigourney Weaver) with an entire planet infested with acid-blooded parasitic aliens. Introducing a team of Marine grunts sent in to investigate the desertion of a planetary mining colony, Director James Cameron fuses action and thriller genres, creating a virtuoso masterpiece of heavy firepower and gripping suspense. Weaver gives an incredible performance as the beleaguered Ripley forced to confront a never ending nightmare and ends up creating a Hollywood rarity, a strong and well-defined female character. A-

Candyman This uneven 1992 thriller based upon a short story by horror novelist Clive Barker, has a good premise but due to an uninspired script, gets lost and becomes nothing more than a standard slasher film. The plot involves the research of a college grad student (Virginia Madsen) into the field of urban folklore, where she unknowingly awakens the ire of an inner-city phantom, Candyman. Before the film is drenched in buckets of blood, the story suprisingly shows some promise. Unfortunately too many questions linger and before long the film decides to follow in the footsteps of psychos past (Freddy Krueger, Jason Vorhies) adding nothing new to that ailing genre. D+

Hero Backed by a superb A-list cast (Dustin Hoffman, Geena Davis, Andy Garcia) and an Oscar nominated screenwriter (David Webb Peoples), director Stephen Frears fashions a slightly uneven satire of the media biz and its quest for heroics, which for the most part soars. The satire sags in a few scenes and Andy Garcia's character is left undeveloped, but despite these flaws, Hero manages to poke good-natured fun at the media industry and make a statement about American societies' constant search for the hero of the moment. B-

Lord of the Flies This 1990 retelling of the perennial junior high reading list mainstay, is a nicely photographed and well directed morality tale. The story of a group of adolescent military school cadets who find solace on a deserted island after their plane crashes in the sea, this film serves as a cautionary tale of power and the corruption it enforces on society. As the survivors of the crash begin to choose sides, intolerance for their enemies rises

Franciose ushers a new genre of jazz

By KENNETH MAISONET
Collegian Staff

Deborah Franciose
Iron Horse
Feb. 18, 1993

Noted jazz pianist/composer Deborah Franciose appeared at the Iron Horse Music Hall in Northampton on Feb. 18 to celebrate the release of her second album, Gypsy Heart. The evening proved to showcase a superb repertoire performed by Franciose and her trio. The multi-talented band included Guatemalen percussionist Ricardo Monson, bassist Ron Murray and drummer Bob Moses.

The evening was filled with intense and explosive sets which included a tribute to the late Dizzy Gillespie titled "For Dizzy," which simultaneously bid farewell and thanked him for all his contributions to the jazz world.

Franciose had captivated the audience with her solo "Patty Joe" which had a soul stirring effect. Her style leaves much to the imagination, her strength and passion to communicate in a very subtle way left the audience caressed by the rhythms.

Her title song "Gypsy Heart" was performed with "impeccable and delicate fire that nestled in Afro-Cuban roots," remarked a member of the audience. The creative interpretations of the song "Escape From Nowhere" pleased even the most discriminating music lover, while pure melodic joy charmed even casual listeners.

Franciose describes her style as an "energy hidden deep within my soul waiting to emerge and express itself" and it's ever-changing presence is one of great potential.

Her association with Boston Pops conductor John Williams has had a tremendous impact on her music. She studied music throughout high school and attended the Boston Conservatory and completed her graduate work at New England Conservatory.

Deborah's first exposure to jazz began shortly after working on George Gershwin's "Rhapsody In Blue" where a new wind blown dynamism of rhythm and style (Jazz) took her by surprise. She pursued this new style and created a unique and explosive symphony of classical/jazz vibrations.

She later met up with Lyle Mays, the keyboard player for the Pat Metheny Group, who took her under his wing and guided and assisted her as she became exposed to different and divergent jazz sounds of other jazz pianists such as Oscar Peterson, Bill Evans and Chuck Correa.

Listen to this! Alternative rock month is here

By KEN MAIURI

Start saving your money now! March is the big "alternative rock" month, when major labels release tons of stuff and all the good bands show up in the area. The avalanche has already begun, and there are some nice surprises, so listen to this!

Spilt Milk
Jellyfish
Charisma Records

You'll either love it or hate it. The second release from Jellyfish, two guys who play everything themselves, is jam-packed with clever musical mimicry of the Beatles, Queen, XTC, and every other popular act from the late 60's and 70's.

Lyrically and musically, Jellyfish snatches ideas from everybody else and sews it all up into a psychadelic trick bag that either makes you smile or wince every time they pull something out.

"Joining a Fan Club" sounds like Queen playing "Sgt. Pepper's Lonely Hearts Club Band;" "All Is Forgiven" is the most bombastically tuneful song ever recorded and has to be heard to be believed, and it segues abruptly into "Russian Hill," an acoustic song with jazzy Henry Mancini-esque orchestral flourishes.

Each of the 12 songs is catchy like a virus, and fans of Pink Floyd's "The Wall" will have a chuckle at the end of the CD. Be brave and buy it! A+

Utilizing their offbeat sense of humor populated by countless bad puns and sight gags, they have created an ingenious comedy which revels in star Leslie Nielsen's oblivious performance as Lt. Detective Frank Drebin. "King" widow Prescilla Presley and Fantasy Island's own Ricardo Montebain round out a trademark Zucker eclectic cast. A-

La Bamba The tragic story of rocker Richie Valens rise from poverty to hit rock n' roll status and subsequent death in a plane crash that also claimed the lives of Buddy Holly and the Big Bopper, is told in this impressive biopic from 1988. Lou Diamond Phillips gives perhaps his best perfomance as Valens and fellow Stand and Deliver alumn Esai Morales earns merit as Valens' anguished brother. The soundtrack featuring original Valens' recordings like "Donna" is excellent. B

Roxanne Steve Martin offers a sweet comic variation of the immortal classic Cyrano de Bergerac . Saddled with an enormous proboscis (nose), Martin's fire chief, Charlie, mines comedic potential out of small town life and attempts to woo Darryl Hannah, despitecompetion from the new firefighter in town. Though it may sound like a cliche, director Fred Schepisi (Mr. Baseball) creates a comic romantic fable that makes you laugh as it touches your heart. B+

Flatliners This medical thriller about a group of med students experimenting with the afterlife is pumped up with impressive visuals. Unfortunately, director Joel Schumacher fails to create any real feeling of suspense, a must for any first rate thriller. The cast including Kiefer Sutherland, Julia Roberts and Kevin Bacon are adequate but they fail to generate any real sympathy for their characters. An underdeveloped script fails to open its possibilities and leaves Flatlines headed for intensive care. C+

Also showing this week but not reviewed are Bye Bye Birdie, Defenseless, The French Connection, Mommie Dearest, To Catch a Thief, Metropolitan, and Judgement in Berlin.

Tool Of the Man
Poster Children
Sire/Reprise

Last year the Poster Children had an excellent Pixies-ish single ("If You See Kay") from a really good album (Daisychain Reaction). Instead of following it up with a more focused album that plays up their strengths, though, the four kids from Illinois have made a boring, tuneless album without one really good song.

"Dynamite Chair," "Clock Street" and "Outside In" stand out, but they aren't enough to recommend the album. A real disappointment. D+

Reachin' (A New Refuatation of Time and Space)
Digable Planets
Pendulum/Elektra

Mellow, man. Digable Planets are three rappers from New York named Doodlebug, Ladybug and Butterfly. They get ideas from Kafka, they're strongly pro-choice, they're relaxed. There are no walloping beats on Reachin', their first album, but that's because they're coming at rap from a jazz mentality. There are great samples sewn into the laid back tapestry of bass and drum machines, and each rapper has a very definite style of their own.

The first single, "Rebirth of Slick (Cool Like Dat)" is ultra-catchy, as are "It's Good to Be Here" and "Where I'm From." The last three or four songs on the disc sound too samey, but if Digable Planets tighten things up a bit, they may be "the next big thing," if you're interested in that sort of label. B

Pure Guava
Ween
Elektra Records

Get this: Ween is two guys, "Dean Ween" and "Gene Ween" who suckered a major label into paying them to jerk around in a recording studio. Ween writes hilarious, nonsensical, or just plain strange songs, and then screws them up further by distorting some of the instruments and vocals, or speeding them up, or slowing them down.

"Little Birdy" is oddly affecting, even when Dener and Gener laugh their way through the last verse; "The Going Gets Tough from the Get-Go" sounds like Madonna with a weird sense of humor; "Big Jilm" makes absolutely no sense but you'll be humming it for weeks; "Push Th' Little Daisies" is a happy song that just might be about death; "Springtheme" sounds like the Chipmunks singing a Prince song. 19 songs, collect 'em all. Buy this thing now! A

By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): A sudden upset that threatens a personal relationship probably stems from a financial problem. Try not to overreact. Get on the ball where a real estate transaction is concerned.

TAURUS (April 20-MAY 20): Timely business communications can have a positive and direct bearing on your finances. Wrap up old projects before starting a new one.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Your judgment may be off where a money or business situation is concerned. You cannot afford to take someone's reassurances at face value. Conduct more research and the fact will surface.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Long-distance communications take on greater importance today. Be alert for an error in data and correct it promptly. Exhilaration is back in the romance department.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Your career may be in a transition stage. Do not lose patience. Better days are coming soon! Search your neighborhood for new ideas for decorating your home.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Exercise special care today to avoid a financial loss. Seek experts' help. Petulance and conflicting opinions may try your patience. A quiet reply can defuse an explosive situation.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Delays can cause frustration and disgust. Meet the challenge head-on. Use any extra time to your advantage. Careful research provides useful information. Exercise discretion.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Start thinking about new ways to cut costs. Any legal action taken at this time will prove expensive. Be more adventuresome where your personal life is concerned.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Look forward to a rewarding day on the job, especially if you are asked to serve alongside VIP's. The bottom line improves. Make the most of a romantic evening!

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): A confusing day may lie ahead. You receive mixed signals from those in charge. Turn to a solid relationship for solace. Your home base is definitely your strength.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Friends and associates show their appreciation as you work for the good of all. New methods receive a fair hearing. Be open to constructive suggestions.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Joint efforts can propel you to new heights today. You gain social prestige as well as financial backing. Be the driving force behind a special project.

No love lost between UM-B.C.

By JASON NASH
Collegian Staff

"I hate B.C., I hate B.C.," one Collegian columist wrote with passion last semester.

Shout the phrase "Go Eagles!" in an uptown bar and you're likely to get the same reaction as yelling "90210 sucks" in the Bluewall.

Talk to any UMass student from Boston, including myself, and they're likely to tell you that there is no lower form of scum in this world than a B.C. hoop fan.

Maybe it's something in the water, but the hatred of Boston College Basketball has become one of the most beloved pastimes on this campus and yet we have not faced them in three years.

Ideally, we have no reason to hate B.C. They have never stolen a recruit illegally or played dirty basketball against us. In fact, this year's Eagle team (15-9 overall, 9-7 in Big East) is a very good one and could get an NCAA Tournament bid. Jim O'Brien will most likely get Big East Coach of the Year and for the record B.C. does play in a better (though not much) league.

Still, even mumble the words of a "UMass-B.C." matchup and you'll see pandemonium throughout the streets of Amherst. Oh, I can see it now. If you think UMass fans were rude to William Cunningham of Temple, just wait until the MinuteManiacs get a hold of Gerrod "Put it on my charge" Abram.

Growing up in Boston, I loved the Eagles. I loved Michael Adams, Gerard Phelan and Bill Romanowski. I loved Jack Bicknell and Dana Barros.

But now I hate Bill Curley, Tom McManus and Tom Coughlin.

I have metamorphasized into be a Minuteman and with that comes the job of hating anything faintly resembling the Boston College emblem. I call it a disease. Maybe "B.C.-itis" a common case of visiting Boston and being surrounded by oodles of B.C. media and news.

Such as Friday's Boston Globe with a feature story on Boston College's Paul "I just crawled off the skateboard ramp" Grant. Come on, guys. Your own state University was heading in to one of its biggest tests of the year against West Virginia and the Globe completely ignored it.

The general consensus around campus calls Boston College a home of bratty, snobs "who's daddy's couldn't get them in anywhere better."

Maybe we hate B.C. because we're jealous. They have Billy Bulger, we have Richard Gere. They have the city Boston and we have the town of Amherst.

So is that it? We are jealous because B.C. gets more attention than us? Hard to say, but the truth is no one from UMass has any reason to hate B.C.

going in there thinking of the last two games, and how bad we played," Calipari said.

After a sluggish first half in which the two teams combined for 29 turnovers, UMass held a 28-18 lead. The lead was cut to 39-33 with 14 minutes left to play before UMass finally put the game away.

Malloy, who was 0-4, all from 3-point land, in the first half after not starting only his second game of the year, hit two treys in the 18-5 run which put the game away. After Williams hit two free throws to make the score 41-33, Malloy launched back-to-back threes from the left wing, both of which hit nothing but net.

With UMass up 47-33, Garland Mance and Dana Dingle traded trifectas before Harry Moore and Derek Kellogg matched field goals. Up by only 14 points, Tony Barbee decided to try his luck from 3-point land.

Barbee's three followed by Williams' gritty determination in putting back an offensive rebound were too much for St. Bonaventure, who called time out down 57-38 with less than 11 minutes left.

Malloy was as torrid in the second half as he was cold in the first. He scored nine straight points in versatile fashion with four minutes left — he drove the lane, grabbed an offensive bound and hit a jumper, hit two free throws, and nailed his final trey of the night to put UMass ahead 82-56.

His outside shooting jump-started the Minutemen, and he said he was urged to continue shooting despite a horrendous first half.

"I just came out thinking about last game, I didn't score, I didn't make a basket," Malloy said. "I was shooting the ball quick, I wasn't taking my time on my follow through.

"[At halftime, Calipari] said don't let that get to me, to keep shooting the ball," Williams said. "That's my role on the team, to shoot. I've got to do more with Mike out."

Mike Williams' outside punch was missed early, and the prognosis for the 6-foot-2 sophomore is not good. Williams found out Sunday that his right hand was broken, and he could miss as many as four weeks. The NCAA Tournament starts in 16 days.

"Hopefully, we're pushing three to four weeks, but I'm pushing for two-and-a-half," Williams said. "It depends on me, it depends how I feel — if I feel it's coming along, I'll take [the cast] off, if not, I'm not gonna make it worse, I'll wait until next year."

In another subplot, Harper Williams was locked in a battle with Bonaventure's Moore for the bragging rights to the A-10's top player. Williams, last year's A-10 Player of the Year, outscored Moore 25-17 and outrebounded him 8-4, yet said he wasn't concerned about being this year's award-winner.

Men's indoor track finishes twelfth in NEs

By SEAN P. HAYDEN
Collegian Staff

Men's indoor track coach Ken O'Brien left this weekend's New England Indoor Track & Field Championships with mixed emotions. Although his University of Massachusetts squad finished twelfth, O'Brien said he was happy because a few of his runners surpassed his expectations with their performances.

"Those kids that scored really did well and the team did well as a whole, but we had a couple of slips and a couple of kids just get shaved out of scoring and the scoring doesn't reflect how we performed," O'Brien said.

UMass had figured to finish somewhere in the bottom half of the second ten, but a couple of slip-ups and close finishes dropped the Minutemen out of the top 10. The Minutemen finished with 16 points in the two-day competition.

"We had seven potential scoring events, but we only scored in four and that dropped us down," O'Brien said, "If we had scored in the seven, we could've finished as high as sixth."

Boston College took first place with 98 points, edging out Northeastern by four points. After that, the scoring dropped off a bit with Boston University taking third with 82 points, followed by the University of Connecticut (64) and the University of Rhode Island (53).

The story of the meet for the Minutemen had to be the exceptional performances of Lyonel Benjamin, Thomas Galligani, Matthew Simon, and the distance medley team.

Benjamin was ranked 22nd out of all the sprinters headed into the championships, but ran well in the qualifying heats and ended up finishing fifth in the 55-meter dash with a time of 6.66 seconds — just missing out on fourth place by .04 seconds and just grabbing fifth by .01 seconds.

Both Galligani and Simon were ranked seventh in their respective events going into the championships, but followed Benjamin's lead and pulled off upsets of their own. Galligani finished third in the triple jump with a jump of 46 feet 6 inches.

Simon took third in the mile with a time of 4:12.47. Erik Nadeau of Northeastern made news in Simon's event by running a sub-four minute mile. He completed the race in 3:59.68.

The distance medley team of Jim Avery (half-mile), Brian King (400 meters), Craig Cormier (three-quarter mile), and Pat Reed (one mile) also earned respect by proving that their 19th-ranked team was indeed much better than that. They finished fifth with a combined time of 10:16.61.

O'Brien said he felt that was the type of exemplary performance the team had been waiting almost all year for and hopes to build on those individual successes for his team's future.

"That's the kind of ladder-climbing we need," O'Brien said, "Now we need to establish a larger scoring base so that if we have guys slip up, someone else will be there to pick up the slack."

Women fall to UNH, look ahead to Georgia

By ARTHUR STAPLETON
Collegian Staff

Last Saturday, the University of Massachusetts women's gymnastics team went in short-handed to compete against New Hampshire; but the team came away with more than just a loss, 188.70-185.30.

Without senior all-arounder Tammy Marshall to start the meet, the Minutewomen looked to rally around junior all-arounder Margaret Furtado, who led UMass their last time out in a victory over Springfield College. However, against the Wildcats, things would be different.

"When you know you're going in a little short-handed, and things get messed up in the middle of the meet, you know if you are 100 percent how well you could have done," said Mitchell.

Furtado was injured while vaulting, and was unable to compete in the final two events for the Minutewomen.

"The best thing is that the people who came in realized that everyone has their jobs to do, and that everyone can pull their own weight," Mitchell said. "We had to put some substitutions in, and they came through, but the score couldn't be that high.

"As far as UNH, they have a really strong team. But we could definitely beat 'em. We'll get them two more times, so we'll see what happens."

Marshall, replacing Furtado on beam, performed a routine which she said lacked the difficulty she normally uses but still received a 9.65. The beam was the best event for the Minutewomen, with everyone hitting, according to Mitchell, who said he feels that it is the key for his team in order to achieve success in the future.

"Beam at the beginning of the year was a bit of a problem. Leann [Zavotka] hit her routine (9.30), Ruth [Reeves] hit her routine (9.45), Abby [May] came through (9.60), Tammy came through (9.65). Beam is our strongest event," Mitchell said.

UMass takes the mat Saturday in the Bulldog Invitational, at the University of Georgia. The teams are among the best in the East — University of Georgia, Penn State University, and West Virginia, along with the Minutewomen. The meet is at 7 p.m.

"Realistically speaking, our chances of going to the Regionals as a team are looking very good. What we want to do is, if we can repeat last week's performance [this weekend], or even better it, we'll be able to wrap this thing up," Mitchell said.

Understanding Eating Disorders:
Strategies for Friends and Family

Tuesday - March 9
6 p.m.- 8 p.m.
UHS - Room 304

I think my roommate has an eating disorder. How can I be sure? What should I do?

I think my sister is anorexic and she isn't getting any help. How can I convince her to see a professional? Who should I suggest...Where should she go?

I'm concerned about my friend who has bulimia. She says it's under control, but I don't think it is. I'm really afraid...What can I do to help?

If you're concerned about someone who you know or suspect is struggling with an eating disorder, come to this informal workshop to explore how you can help and cope with these issues.

Player of the Game

Harper Williams, 6-7 Sr. Forward

Williams, who scored 25 points, was consistent the whole night, leading the team in scoring at halftime and for the game. He shut down the Bonnies defensively with two blocks and two steals and was full of fire and determination for the full 40 minutes.

Why UMass won

The Minutemen were led by the inside play of Harper Williams and Lou Roe (14 points) and the second half outside shooting of Jerome Malloy. St. Bonaventure's Harry Moore, the A-10's leading scorer, got into foul trouble early and was not as effective. UMass turned play up a notch with 13 minutes remaining and never looked back.

UMass' next opponent

The Minutemen, A-10 title securely in hand, close out the regular season Thursday night against the second place St. Joseph's Hawks. St. Joseph's is 17-8 and 8-5 in the conference, and will be facing the Minutemen on Senior Night. UMass won the first meeting with St. Joe's by a 81-69 count. Harper Williams had 21 points.

Minutemen win A-10 season title

Rebound from sluggish first half, coast to 86-62 victory

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

With the University of Massachusetts basketball team dropping two straight games in disturbing fashion, with their super sub, Mike Williams, out three weeks with a broken hand, and with only two games remaining in the regular season, the Minutemen needed something to break out of their funk.

Last night, it took them more than 20 minutes to break out against St. Bonaventure University. Luckily for them, they were able to take their time.

When they finally turned on their jets, the No. 23 Minutemen (19-6, 10-3 in the A-10) nearly blew the Bonnies off the floor en route to a 86-62 win and a second straight Atlantic 10 regular season championship.

With Harper Williams setting a season high with 25 points and Jerome Malloy turning from ice cold to red hot from three-point range, UMass snapped the two-game skid with relative ease.

The Minutemen will face the Bonnies (10-15, 0-13 A-10) again Sunday in the A-10 Tournament, with the Minutemen holding the top seed and St. Bonaventure firmly entrenched as the number eight seed.

"I'm happy that we won the championship again, two years in a row," said UMass head coach John Calipari. "I'm happy that we're going down to the [A-10] tournament and we know our seed.

"If we play a scrappy game, we're gonna be fine. In the first half, I thought we were tentative again. I mean, I think we were

Williams vies to be top A-10 player

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

Despite missing nine games due to injury and getting off to an admitted slow start, University of Massachusetts center Harper Williams is likely to be named Atlantic 10 Player of the Year Saturday for the second consecutive season.

Williams, averaging 16.4 points, 7.9 rebounds and 2.3 blocks a game, is considered the leading candidate for the award in a league that has no true superstar.

"I think Harper is the Player of the Year because he is the most important player on the best team," St. Joseph's coach John Griffin said. "I think Lou Roe might be the best player in the league, but Harper will probably win the award."

Roe, a sophomore forward for the Minutemen, Temple guard Aaron McKie and George Washington guard Dirkk Surles are also leading candidates for the honor.

"I think the three candidates are McKie, Roe and Harper Williams," URI coach Al Skinner said. "I'm still not sure who I like, but I guess I'd lean toward Harper."

It was only six weeks ago that Williams, who broke his right hand in late December, ended speculation that he would seek a medical redshirt by returning to action against Temple. In the 12 games since then, Williams, who played uninspired basketball in December, has re-established himself as the class of the league.

"Harper is a great player, probably the most dangerous player in the league," Temple coach John Chaney said. "To come back from his injury and play the way he has proves that he is for real."

Williams, who poured in 25 points and grabbed eight rebounds in an 86-62 victory over St. Bonaventure, said he does not pay much attention to individual awards.

"I just want to finish the year strong — if they pick me then fine, if not, no problem," Williams said.

Last season, Williams averaged 13.9 points and 7.5 rebounds to edge out West Virginia's Ricky Robinson and teammate Jim McCoy for Player of the Year honors.

"Last year I was more of a fighting Harper Williams," the 6-foot-7 senior center said. "This year everyone expected me to come out and play well. Guys were gunning for me more. They are always saying to me 'So your the A-10 Player of the Year? Prove it to me.'"

If he does not capture the award, Williams would like to see Roe win it.

"As long as it goes to a player on my team, then I don't care," he said.

UMass coach John Calipari said his entire starting frontcourt are all viable candidates.

"I think it should either go to Harper, Tony [Barbee] or Lou," Calipari said. "You can say Aaron McKie or you can say Dirkk Surles, but I don't think there is any question it should go to one of those three."

Roe, who is averaging 14.5 points and 9.3 rebounds a game, said, "Harper truly deserves it. He has provided a lot of senior leadership and maturity. He's been more than just the best player on the court."

Roe struggled when Williams sat out nine games in December and January, only to return to top form following Williams return.

"Harp freed me up to crash the boards more," Roe said. "Guys focus on him and that makes things easier for me."

All postseason awards are voted upon by members of the A-10 media and the league's head coaches. Award winners will be named Saturday at the A-10 post season banquet in Philadelphia.

Women host BU in final home game

By JEFF CROFTS
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's basketball team (9-15, 5-8 in the Atlantic 10) plays its final home game of the season tonight as the Minutewomen host Boston University (9-15, 3-10 North Atlantic) at the Curry Hicks Cage (7 p.m.). For UMass, tonight's game will represent a break from the rugged action in the A-10 conference.

Speed and toughness are two qualities which UMass coach Joannie O'Brien said the BU Terriers possess.

"They are a scrappy team and quickness is one of their strengths," O'Brien said. "They have a nice perimeter game also."

The keys for the Minutewomen, according to O'Brien, will be the usual — get inside to their frontcourt and control the tempo of the game.

"We are going to have try and play a halfcourt game," O'Brien said. "We will try to pound it inside to Kim (Kristofik), Octavia (Thomas), and Melissa (Gurile)."

Another key will be whether the Minutewomen take care of the ball. In their last contest, a 71-63 loss to Rutgers, UMass turned the ball over 34 times. O'Brien said her team has got to play solid basketball.

"It is just a matter of execution for us," O'Brien said. "[BU] will probably try to press us, we just need to execute better."

As for individual performers, O'Brien cited BU's Jill Sosnak and Andrea Higgins. Sosnak leads the Terriers in scoring (16.0 ppg) and rebounding (8.2 rpg). Higgins, meanwhile, scores at a 10.9 clip while dishing out 7.1 assists per game.

Other contributors for BU include Annema Olson (14.4 ppg, 7.0 rpg) and Julie Schmidt (10.5 ppg).

For UMass seniors Kim Kristofik and Gloria Nevarez, tonight's game represents their final home game ever at the Cage. O'Brien says that fact, coupled with the fact that the game is a non-conference contest, should make tonight's game an enjoyable one.

"I think tonight's game is a good one for us," O'Brien said. "It will be nice in the fact that it will be Kim and Gloria's last home game."

"The pressure is not really there as much as in a conference game," O'Brien said. "I think that we should do all right, as long as we come to play."

The Minutewomen will go with a frontcourt of center Melissa Gurile and forwards Kristofik and Octavia Thomas.

In the backcourt, UMass will probably have freshman squared as Tricia Hopson will man the point while Kim Gregory handles the off guard role. Junior Maleeka Valentine will rotate in at the backcourt while sophomore Francie Hansen provides depth at forward.

Siege drags, end not seen in third day

By TERRI LANGFORD
Associated Press

WACO, Texas — An armed religious cult's leader said he would surrender Tuesday and end a siege that has killed at least six, but the standoff dragged on well into its third day.

A newspaper reported Tuesday that the death toll from Sunday's gun battles at the Branch Davidian compound may be at least 11. Authorities have said four federal agents and at least two people inside the compound were killed.

The Houston Chronicle, quoting unidentified sources, reported that children released from the compound said at least seven people inside were killed in the fire fight. The newspaper, in its afternoon editions, also said agents believed they had killed as many as 15 people.

A state source, who spoke on condition of anonymity, told The Associated Press he had heard that seven cult members had died and up to 40 people had been wounded. Officials have said about 75 people were in the compound, but cult leader David Koresh has claimed more.

In a 58-minute, taped statement broadcast Tuesday on Texas radio stations at the FBI's request, the cult leader said: "I, David Koresh, agree upon the broadcasting of this tape to come out peacefully with all the people immediately."

Students sign petition to legalize marijuana

By KENDRA WILLETT
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts students have signed a petition allowing a question concerning the "legalization" of hemp on campus to appear on the Student Government Association ballot on March 9 and 10.

The question advocates the use of cannabis as a beneficial crop, both enviromentally and economically. It would also call for the nullification of all laws which restrict the use of cannabis hemp on campus.

According to Aaron Wilson, vice-president of the University of Massachusetts Cannabis Reform Coalition, one of the major goals of the referendum question is to keep action regarding marijuana use within the University disciplinary system.

Wilson said 2,100 students signed the petition in less than 2 weeks. The Coalition only needed 1,172 signatures to make the ballot.

"Now that we have made the ballot, we are looking for a 'Yes' vote," Wilson said. "And we are going to get as many voters as possible."

Until March 10, the Coalition will be passing out leaflets in the Dining Commons, meeting in dorms to share information and hanging posters to support the campaign.

"Now that we know that we have support, our goal is to recruit people who are on the fence," Wilson said.

Jon Aronson, chairperson of the Undergraduate Student Senate's Governmental Affairs Committee, knew that Many read electronic Chinese paper

By GEORGE ZHU
Collegian Staff

Some people may get news from The New York Times, ABC News, or the Collegian. But for many Chinese students at the University and elsewhere, the Chinese News Digest is another source to the outside world, especially about China. And it's done through the computer. Yes, computer networks.

Seemingly the world's largest electronic mail news distribution service, the China News Digest was founded on March 6, 1989 by a group of Chinese students studying in the U.S. and Canada.

Wei Lin, the Digest's manager and a post-doctoral research associate at the University of Washington, said he is proud of the service that his group has been providing to the overseas Chinese community.

"CND has readers all over the world, including such countries as Lithuania, Saudi Arabia, Turkey, Hungary and China," Lin said. "It has become an important part of Chinese students' daily life."

Recent statistics show that the Digest now reaches more than 24,000 readers in 37 countries and regions over all continents except Africa, according to Lin.

Yiguang Qiu, who recently received his Ph.D. from the University, said he has been a keen reader of the Digest for more than three years.

"CND is a unique news service in the international student community," Qiu said. "It's fast, it's wide-ranging, it's free, and it's about China."

Besides the daily English news coverage of Chinese affairs and regional news within local Chinese communities, CND also offers the world's first electronic Chinese magazines named Hua Xia Wen

Women leaders are advocating fighting bigotry

By SEEMA MALHOTRA
Collegian Correspondent

Editor's note: This article is part of ongoing coverage of the Feb. 27 Women's Conference which will appear throughout the week.

The importance of women participating in leadership positions and in the struggle against injustice, both at home and abroad, were some of the issues discussed in a workshop at the University of Massachusetts Women's Conference last Saturday.

The workshop focused on women as activists and leaders. The panelists sharing their experiences as organizers were Esparanza Mortel, an activist and social worker whose work focuses on the issues of political prisoners, Michael-Ann Bewsee, an activist from the women's support group ARISE, and Madeline Peters, director of Disability services at the University of Massachusetts.

Discussing her experience of colonization in Puerto Rico, Mortel described the anger and rage that led her to become an activist. She came to New York City at the age of three and since then she has been dealing with the traumas of colonization.

"Since being put on that plane and brought here I can see everything that colonization has done to the individual. On top of colonization I also had to deal with the patriarchy of society," said Mortel, who is a survivor of rape and sexual abuse.

It was the diversity of such experiences that led her to political activism and the pursuit of the desire for change.

"We should learn to focus on the things we have in common."
– Michael-Ann Bewsee, ARISE

"It brings you to that moment when you get totally frustrated with the bourgeois democratic process," Mortel said. "We have the right as colonies to struggle for self-determination by arms if necessary."

Describing her work with political prisoners, Mortel challenged the way we tend to support prisoners abroad but deny those in our own country the title of political prisoner.

"Why is it so difficult for us to take on issues that are issues in our own country?" Mortel said. "Why do we feel pity when we see a child starving across the world but not here? We should not separate them, but perceive them as one. This is my life. This is who I am - an activist trying to make a difference."

Similar sentiments were expressed by activist Madeline Peters who spoke of anger as being a major factor in bringing us to where we are.

"We realize that we want to make a difference," Peters said.

Peters' work brings her to deal with issues of racism, organizing events in local schools, working with youth groups and working in youth empowerment coalitions.

"The challenge comes from anger. People should move and get motivated."

Michael-Ann Bewsee spoke of her organization ARISE in which she is involved. ARISE, founded by four women on welfare, focuses on economic issues. The process of empowerment was one of its main concerns, and it came together to organize around the issue of child support.

"It is important for this to be a woman-based organization ," Bewsee said. "We should learn to focus on the things we have in common."

Speaking also on the need to fight issues of racism and sexism, she said, "We're running away from issues and not truly confronting them. It is time to take hold of life and transcend it."

Student Senate Update

The Student Senate Update is a service of the Collegian and the Student Senate to inform students about upcoming items on the senate agenda.

The following motions are on the agenda for debate and voting for the meeting of the Undergraduate Student Senate on Wed., March 3, 1993 at 7 p.m. in the Campus Center Auditorium.

The following items are on the agenda for March 3, 1993. At the outset of the meeting there will be a discussion about the proposed reorganization of the Division of Student Activities and the Student Activities Trust Fund.

Following this, Chancellor Richard O'Brien will address the Senate and field questions. In addition, there is a motion to limit all student salaries in the SATF to minimum wage at a maximum of fifteen hours per week, with exceptions to be granted by the SGA.

All members of the University community are invited to attend and speak on any motions that come up at the meeting. As the Student Senate is the representative body of all UMass undergraduates, the University community is encouraged to attend and be aware of the motions and opinions it passes.

Woman is dropping rape charges

DURHAM, N.H. (AP) — The woman who accused New England Patriots linebacker Dwayne Sabb of raping her has dropped the charges, saying she does not want to go through with the trial.

Sabb, a former University of New Hampshire player, is relieved and grateful, defense lawyer Cathy Green said in a statement. Sabb's trial was to have begun March 22 in Strafford County Superior Court in Dover.

"He maintained faith in the judicial system throughout this process," Green said Monday. "He will now be able to fully concentrate on his career."

Sabb, Green said, maintained his innocence from the beginning.

"The facts developed in the course of our preparation and investigation of this case demonstrated Dwayne's innocence," she said. "We believe that the county attorney exercised sound judgment in withdrawing these charges."

Strafford County Attorney Lincoln Soldati said he could not justify prosecuting the case and subjecting the woman to more trauma, especially when she wanted it to end.

"I feel badly the victim was unable to go forward with it," Soldati said. "It's unfortunate these cases place so much stress on the victim, but that's the reality, and I understand that."

Soldati said the woman and her family were under stress and reached the point where they didn't want to continue.

The news was heralded by UNH football coach Bill Bowes and Athletic Director Gib Chapman.

"First and foremost, it's good news for Dwayne Sabb," Chapman said. "Dwayne Sabb is a class individual. He's well liked by the students. I'm very pleased for him.

"Secondly, I think it's had some negative impact on the UNH athletic programs and I'm pretty happy that that's going to be dropped, too."

"I feel sorry for Dwayne... because he's gone through a great deal of expense," Bowes said. "I'm sure he's very happy that he's been cleared at this point. I think he has suffered enough. I'm sure it's something he's happy to put behind him."

Sabb, who was a Patriots' fifth-round draft pick last year, was accused of raping the woman twice in 1991 while both were students at the University of New Hampshire in Durham.

The 6-foot-4, 250-pound Sabb "used his weight and superior strength" to force himself on the woman, who was 17 years old at the time, according to a police affidavit.

The alleged assaults took place in October and November 1991.

Physics Professor Leroy Cook got an expensive Valentine. Cook received $1.2 million on Valentine's Day from the National Science Foundation for the University of Massachusetts to create a program for high school physics teachers.

To improve teaching effectiveness and focus on the poor performance of high school science students, the University will establish University Physics Departments and Alliances for Teacher Enhancement, said Cook who will be director of the three-year program.

By having local high school teachers communicating with University faculty, Cook said high school physics teachers will finally be getting the support they need. The other UMass campuses, Boston, Dartmouth and Lowell, will also be participating in the program, which will be providing workshops.

"In 90 percent of our public high schools, there is only one physics teacher. As a result, few high school physics teachers have colleagues with whom they can discuss relevant issues in science and education," Cook said. "We can help address that concern by bringing together high school physics teachers to discuss issues of common concern."

By hosting physics professors for two weeks on each of the four UMass campuses and an additional week at UMass-Amherst during the summer, Cook said physic professors will establish valuable networks. Internationally renowned scientist, Philip Morrisen, who teaches at Massachusetts Institute of Technology, will be leading a contemporary astronomy program at the summer convention in Amherst.

Although U.S. research is regarded as one of the best by the rest of the world, Cook said young people are not taught to be proficient in science and mathematics. For 10 years Cook has worked with high school teachers in not only coordinating residential summer programs, but also in arranging an annual physics and astronomy symposium.

"Pooling our experience and resources in a coordinated, statewide program is the goal," Cook said. "We learned from the many teachers who we've worked with in the past, that they want more intellectual stimulation, and more contact with physicists at the University level. This NSF grant will help us provide that missing element."

Club raises money for orphanage

Students are willing to give funds, member says

By VANESSA ADELMAN
Collegian Correspondent

The South Asian Club held its third dance last Saturday, as part of its efforts to raise money for the Indian orphanage that it sponsors. Jhankar Night, which means festival, was held on the tenth floor of the Campus Center.

According to Sonalee Patel, an active member of the club, a dance has been held once every semester by the club since they began to sponsor the orphanage in January 1992.

"Our goal is to get the orphanage to be self-sustaining," Patel said.

People from the Five College area, Rutgers University, Boston, Rhode Island and New York, attended the dance, according to the sign-in book. There was a very international crowd, Patel said.

The Aarti Home Orphanage in Cuddapah, A.P., India is the home for nine children 3 to 7-years-old, a maid and a teacher, Patel said.

"Though the children go to a local school," Patel said, "we are trying to build a schoolhouse for them."

According to Patel, the club funds the orphanage through the Vijay Fund Trust Association, a committee in India. The club chose this specific orphanage when two of its members visited. Patel said there is a huge South Asian community on campus who are willing to help raise money.

"We'll continue to hold a dance until we reach our goal, but private donations are always welcome," Patel said.

According to Patel, the club hopes to reach the fund-raising goal before she graduates next spring.

Environmental group is fighting for clean water

By TROY MERRICK
Collegian Staff

The fish, caught for food, are often unsafe to eat because of contamination of the waters where fish swim, according to the staff director for a local environmental organization.

According to Michael Goldman of Clean Water Action, an environmental organization on Main Street in Northampton, this is just one among many environmental and health issues that millions of Americans are unaware of.

Goldman said the main problem in Massachusetts is the mercury contamination in fish. He said this is caused mainly by coal-fired power plants and municipal garbage incinerators sending the mercury into the air, only to be later washed into the water table and food chain by rain and snow.

"Massachusetts burns approximately half of its trash, and that's way too much," Goldman said. "Over 100 town water supplies have been lost in this state alone due to contamination."

First established in 1971 in Washington D.C., Clean Water Action has expanded to a membership of over one million people and 27 offices nationwide.

By going house-to-house, members attempt to educate citizens of various communities throughout the state on the current issues and legislation concerning the environment.

Beginning with water issues, the organization has since broadened its scope to deal with the ever-increasing number of habitual problems that arise, such as toxic waste dumping, coastal problems, solid waste management, and the mercury levels in fish, which is a staple food in some low-income and minority populations.

Their goal is to influence the decisions of bureaucrats and politicians through the public demand, and is done through media, organizing events and press releases. Most of the work is done by knocking on doors and having face-to-face contact with the residents and asking them to sign petitions and make donations for the cause.

"We have more outreach through grassroots lobbying than any other organization in the country," said Goldman, staff director of the Northampton branch.

"With grassroots issues directly aimed at the public, we are trying to incorporate people that those very politicians represent — those who aren't normally involved with this legislation," Goldman said. "There's strength in numbers."

Goldman said some people, such as those representing oil refineries, chemical companies and land developers, are against the position that Clean Water Action and its supporters represent.

"Those kinds of operations would naturally oppose any save-the-land kind of legislation, because exploiting the land is how they get rich," Goldman said.

Clean Water Action's most current bill is one to get batteries recycled rather than the present method of their riddance — burying or burning them. It has been introduced to the Natural Resource Center, and will be presented by co-sponsors State Sen. Stanley Rosenberg (D-Amherst) and State Rep. Ellen Story (D-Amherst) at its first hearing on April 13.

Goldman said between 98 and 99 percent of Clean Water Action's funding comes from its members. So, as he said, there is no depending on any government "favors," which lead to a higher level of integrity and achievement.

Some of the organization's biggest accomplishments came in 1972 with the Clean Water Act and in 1986 with the "Superfund" and the "Worker's Right to Know" Act.

"The Clean Water Act dealt with the surface waters such as rivers, lakes, streams and wetlands, and since 1972 has had a number of re-authorizations," Goldman said. "The Superfund dealt with cleaning up some of the worst toxic waste sites in the country and Worker's Right to Know Bill was about workers in the waste management field being exposed to high levels of toxic material."

The organization hires students part-time during the semester and full-time staff members, who are mostly Chinese students and professionals studying and working in the United States, Canada, Europe, Australia and Asia.

"The reason I became a volunteer editor was the sense of helping other people and bonding to a group of energetic, nice people," said Gang Xu, a CND staff member and a university professor in Japan.

Demng Tang, a former CND manager is now a research scientist at a private firm in Boston, said working in CND has made him "learn how to interact with people via networks and try to understand their feelings and motivation."

enough of the students at UMass would support the initiative.

"[The campaign] is a statement of feeling and opinion," Aronson said.

In order for the question to remain binding, at least 15 percent of the student body must vote. A simple majority vote is needed in order for the question to win.

No matter how many signatures the Coalition has, there are still students who are against the legalization.

"It's not something I agree with morally," said Rob Pedowitz, a junior microbiology major who said he knows of many people who smoke pot. "I don't see how it could ever be beneficial to society, and I think it may cause people to be lazy and unproductive."

Scott Weinberg, sophomore business major, on the other hand, said he believes that hemp can solve problems, like saving forests and bringing in revenue for the government.

"If alcohol is legal, there is no reason why marijuana shouldn't be," Weinberg said.

According to Wilson, a victory rally is already planned for March 11. "I am positive that the consensus will be yes."

siege

"Even a man like Christ has to meet with unbelief," said Koresh, 33, who thinks he's Jesus.

"I'm sure you're all aware of how I'm, involved in a very serious thing right now," Koresh said. "I am really concerned about the lives of all those in this world."

Buses and other military vehicles moved nearer within minutes of the broadcast's start. About two hours after the broadcast ended, there was no indication Koresh had surrendered.

The Federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms abruptly canceled a midafternoon news conference with a one-sentecne statement saying the standoff was not over.

The siege began Sunday morning as about 100 ATF agents raided the compound, seeking to serve firearms violations warrants on Koresh, and gun battles erupted. Among those reportedly killed in the raid was Koresh's 2-year-old daughter.

Koresh told a radio station he had been gravely wounded Sunday.

Koresh began letting children out late Sunday after a station agreed to broadcast a statement by him. Before Koresh's radio statement, eight more children left the compound Tuesday, bringing the number of children released to 16. Two women also left, the first adults to leave the compound voluntarily.

Candidate Forum

Editor's note: This is the third of a series of editorials written by candidates for the upcoming Student Government Association election March 9 and 10.

Student empowerment. This is the focus of my campaign for Student Government Association president.

The SGA should be strongly representative of the body for which it was created to represent: the student body of the University of Massachusetts.

Jennifer A.
FAZZI

The SGA president, must realize that he/she was not duly elected simply to be "in charge of the SGA," but in a sense was "hired" by the student body to listen to their concerns and then to act accordingly to improve upon or to change situations that the general student population feels could do better. This, in a nutshell, is the task of the SGA president.

The SGA president is, essentially, "the student voice." The administration, in many cases, needs to be addressed. The SGA president is not there to pick and choose the issues he/she feels are most important. It is the students who should have the say as to what needs to be addressed. It is the students who are paying to attend this university; therefore, the students should have the power to change what they feel is necessary.

If elected SGA president, I had determined a number of issues I wanted to address. I have to admit that originally most of the issues were fairly general. I am concerned about diverse campus issues and feel that every student on campus should have equal say as to what SGA should be doing. If I had it my way there would be no racism, sexism and the such to deal with however this is the real world and these problems exist. I would do my best to fairly represent all student interests and would support programs to educate students as to the wrongness of such discriminatory acts. While these issues are of great importance to me, it wasn't until I began going door to door to campaign that I got a feel for what the average student who is not actively involved with SGA or campus political issues is concerned about.

Across the entire campus, I was amazed by the consistency of concerns the average student voiced to me. They ranged from the heating problems in residence halls along with inadequate furniture, to the desire for more accessible change machines in each area and a greater number of washers and dryers in each residence hall. In Southwest, the most popular request was that a bank machine be installed in Hampden Commons. All over campus there were complaints about the long lines at Whitmore and the long wait for medical attention at Health Services. These are the concerns of the average student. Are these changes too much to ask for? Absolutely not. This university was created for students and therefore should be run by the students. If such an exceptionally high number of students feel that a situation should be changed, then it probably should be. It is the SGA president who should be the voice arguing for that change.

All in all, I feel that my position is quite clear. If elected SGA president, I intend to take steps to address campus issues with an open mind. No concern will be turned away or ridiculed. It is important to remember that it is not the SGA president who should have the power but the students who voted him/her into office. Essentially, the SGA will not be viewed as an exclusive "club" in which only a select few students discuss campus issues, but will be viewed as an organization of students elected to work for students.

Jennifer A. Fazzi is an undergraduate candidate for the office of SGA president.

A flight to somewhere else

There's this place.

A small cabin in the hills of Vermont with a quiet lake that shimmers in the rising sun and reflects into the large bay window as you stare out into the sky and know all of your worries have passed with the morning mist.

A cramped apartment with all of your possessions scattered around the room, only visible from the dull glow of the city's weary night lanterns which flicker as each lone car passes under and disappears into anonymity.

Nathan
CRICK

A battered truck driving through the rolling hills of Europe with an old man you have never seen nor can understand but who picked you up anyway with your backpack of clothes on your way to somewhere.

An ocean that stretches into forever and stops only to caress itself on the white sands of an island where time drifts by without knowledge and only the setting sun reminds you that there is something beyond the eternity of the horizon.

A place anywhere but here.

Freedom but not quite freedom. Goals which do not drive you to envision anything but escape. The discovery of a world apart from the illusions of youth and the innocence of ignorance. Visions of where you have never been and fear you will never go.

There is something within us that is triggered in the hazy reality into which we enter when we begin our time at these places of higher learning. The thrill of being away fades along with the floor parties and freshman camaraderie, and soon we are simply here. Here with our small group of friends and a major we seem to enjoy and maybe a steady relationship with someone....

It just doesn't seem enough. Relationships grow old and safe and classes become the tedium and facts and theories and people you knew slowly fade away. It does not happen all that suddenly, it just seems like sometimes everything is out to smother you and even the person you think you'd want to marry is one of the things holding the pillow over your face.

It makes you want to scream out on the balcony and run away to that place where everything would disappear and life would finally come together; but you don't. You don't because these things are shoved down inside your head, and that fear that you are alone in these feelings and the chastisement this revelation would bring upon you would be too much. So instead you think of that cabin by the shore or the city on the hill and make plans to find it when you embark from this hazy reality, and you tell no one but your cat when you go home and wonder why there is absolutely nothing to do except watch television after dinner.

So the reruns play and the college keeps on teaching and everything becomes so damned routine, and every day it seems like you are losing the chance to really find a way out. Every day the island sinks and riots are destroying your peaceful city, and every day you want to go rescue it.

In my mind I do not believe life will take on some heightened significance just because you get on a plane and fly to Somewhere Else, but I'm probably going to go to England next year anyway. There is something in the following through of the quest that lets you know.

It lets you know if you can stare out the window over the lake and not grow lonely, lie awake in a city apartment and ignore the sirens, ride through the hills and not wish for a home, or walk along the beach and endure the isolation. Life is funny, and I suppose the greatest mystery is finding out where we really belong. I think we all just fear that it's only in our dreams.

Parish case: are drugs all that bad?

And so, Robert Parish has gone before the court and the court has served up its oven-baked meal food, covered with runny blisters, a skanked-while-you-sleep product it likes to call justice. The chief is free, the chief paid some fines, and the whole incident is considered over and done with.

Chris J.
PETROPOULOS

This is a nasty little moral quandary for me. I like the chief; I think he is one of the most admirable men in the NBA and I never want to see him retire or leave. I also think the current drug laws are draconian and completely unrepresentative of what most Americans think about drugs, and how many Americans are using drugs. If Robert Parish wants to relax after going four grueling quarters with Patrick Ewing by rolling a big joint, sitting back and cruising around the wispy ether of his brain, it's okay with me.

Still, I shudder to think what would happen if I were caught having several ounces of marijuana sent to my home. I am all but certain that something more than what Parish suffered would come roaring at me, with documents and lawyers fees and probably a few days in some kind of correctional facility. The question is this: did Robert Parish's fame, money and obvious love and support from his fans influence his treatment before the court? And if so, is that his fault, or the fault of the ever crumbling legal system and the ineffective drug laws?

Right now, as all of you read this, waiting for me to become offensive or obscure, not really thinking about drug use in this country, people are lighting up joints and crack pipes, dropping acid, cooking up little spoons of junk or eating belladonna. (Do not ever eat belladonna.) The police encounter and put a stop to very little of this activity. They, to their credit, are outnumbered and every day the fiends think of new ways to transport, hide and ingest drugs.

Dragging Robert Parish before a judge and slapping his wrist does nothing to dent the use and abuse of these substances. Dragging Robert Parish before a judge does nothing but provide amusement for Celtics fans.

Drugs are a touchy subject for everyone, and even more so for conservatives. Traditional conservative values, and recent conservative presidents, are inclined to think that drugs are dangerous, evil substances that ruin lives and corrode the productive fabric of our nation with violence and huge piles of dead brain cells. But, in light of the harsh realities, one begins to lean toward the position that no one ever forced anyone else to become addicted to any drug. It is, after all, a personal choice. Alcohol, a very dangerous drug (and, coincidentally, your best drug value), is legal and not everyone uses it.

Could it be? Could the conservative movement join forces with the maggot-infested, long-haired freaky fringe dwellers, and end the drug problem once and for all with cautious, managed legalization? The fiscal benefits would be an added incentive.

But is America ready for the Grand Old Party to loosen its tie, pack a bowl and embrace what for decades has been its antithesis?

Robert Parish smokes pot. He's a dedicated professional, a contributing member of society, and focuses on attaining his personal best. If those are not conservative values, I must have been smoking myself all these years. It is the area of personal choice that allows a softening of drug policy and an enlightening of minds to the backbone of conservative thought.

Columnist leaves reader disappointed

I'd like to respond to Jeff McKenzie's article [Collegian, Feb. 26]. In no way, shape or form am I trying to "rip apart" the article. In many ways it was truly beautiful. It discussed topics that deserve attention, and for that I was surprised and grateful.

The entire beginning of the story was enveloping. I could almost feel the guide wire beneath my grip and the tickle of snowflakes. It is wonderful to see that there are still people left who are open to new and strange experiences, that there are people willing to take the time to understand the handicapped.

But just when I was swallowing this "eye-opening" revelation, the direction of the article changed completely. His female companion on this journey was leading him when she turned and said something every woman feels, eyes open or closed. It is fear. It is vulnerability. It is weakness. It is statistics.

Ever since the racial incidents that tore apart the campus last semester, I've been angry. Of course I was angry at the whole idea that racism exists and that people could hate for such ludicrous reason, etc. Above this, though, I still am upset over an interview following these incidents. An African-American student was asked if he feared walking alone at night on campus. Outside of Mr. McKenzie's article, I have yet to see anyone bring up the topic of women feeling afraid on campus or anywhere!

I think Mr. McKenzie literally stumbled onto something, but couldn't fathom the extent of the fear. It is a constant nag, like Magnum P.I.'s "little voice" that used to always warn him of danger. It is a fact to accept and occasionally repress, to save one's sanity. If he had really understood, his ending wouldn't have been so disappointing. He had a great opportunity to feel the horror movie effect of the bad man breathing right behind him. There was so much potential for greatness in this article, but the letdown I felt when he left it with a mere, "It was all over, for me," was enough to inspire a response.

For his revelation, I am grateful. For his effort, I am disappointed.

United States quells Native American sovereignty

Editor's note — This is the last of the two-part series about the Federal Bureau of Investigations counterintelligence programs.

"The white man made us many promises, but he only kept one. He promised to take our land, and he took it." — Mahpiya Luta (Red Cloud) Oglala Lakota leader, 1882

In the seventies the Federal Bureau of Investigation launched its greatest counterintelligence program ever: the quelling of the Native American uprising. It shifted its focus from the urban ghettos to the Pine Ridge Sioux Reservation in South Dakota.

Eurocentricism is the hallmark of standard history texts and history courses in the United States, even at the collegiate level. The image of the colonial White settler is that of a courageous entrepreneur with a Protestant work ethic. Texts inculcate, in the average student, the notion that the wealth in this country was created as the result of some immanent dynamism in the European settlers. They fail to mention the land was stolen from the Native Americans, that gold and other minerals were extracted from their land, and that the economy was founded on slavery.

The depiction of Native Americans is that of passive acquiescence to the usurpation of their rights by the White man. Native Americans are not "noble savages." They are people who have fought tooth and nail in defense of their national sovereignty, culture and right to live as they choose. Native Americans have resisted and continue to resist integration into the dominant mode of production — as wage laborers.

They also resisted integration in the emerging Euro-American culture. Hence, the White colonial settlers mounted a systematic campaign to exterminate Native Americans, expropriate their land and destroy their culture. This campaign continues even today, in various forms, such as the dumping of toxic wastes on Native American reservations, the extraction of minerals such as uranium from their land by multinationals and the U.S. government, and the establishment of liquor stores and gambling casinos primarily by Whites on reservations.

Historical Background

The Lakota Nation in the 19th century was 3 percent of the continental U.S. land mass — spanning regions in present day Montana, North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska and Wyoming. The Fort Larmaie Treaty of 1851 guaranteed the territories to the Lakota peoples, who were comprised of seven groups of which the Oglalas was the largest.

In 1865, the U.S. army was instructed to establish a string of posts along a route known as the "Bozeman Trail" to open up two direct routes northward from the fort, across the sacred Black Hills and the Big Horn mountains, to the newly discovered gold fields near Virginia City, South Dakota. The posts were established to protect the trail from the defensive responses of the Indians whose legally recognized homeland had thus been invaded.

Under the leadership of Mahpiya Luta, the Oglalas forged a united military response along with the Arapho and Northern Cheyenne, in response to the U.S. military invasion and threat to their buffalo economy.

In 1866, the North American soldiers halted all traffic along the Bozeman Trail, seizing the posts and defeating the troops of the U.S. army. After the battles of "Hayfield" and the "Wagon Box" near Forth Smith and Fort Kearney, the U.S. began a series of overtures to discuss peace negotiations. They realized that they had seriously underestimated the Indians' ability to mount a coordinated and sustained war. The U.S. wanted to avert full-scale military disaster.

A peace treaty was signed on April 29, 1868 and ratified by the Congress in 1869. The U.S. had conceded to all the Native American demands under Articles 2, 16 and 17. The Lakota homeland, centered on the Black Hills, was for the exclusive use and occupancy of the indigenous peoples. The ratified treaty recognized the national sovereignity of the Lakotas by all accepted standards of international law and custom.

In 1872, a Jesuit missionary, Jean De Snet who had trespassed on Lakota territory, confided to the Sioux Falls Times editor that he believed there were considerable amounts of mineral deposits on Lakota territory. By 1874, area newspapers were clamoring for, "improvement and development of one of the richest and most fertile sections of America." They demanded to know, "what [was] to be done with these Indian dogs in our manger?"

Congressman Moses K. Armstrong introduced a bill for the purchase of Lakota territory and sent the Seventh Cavalry regiment from Fort Lincoln under General Custer, to Lakota territory, in case they proved reluctant. Custer took with him geologists to ascertain the presence of mineral wealth in the Black Hills. Though it is not clear whether gold was actually discovered by anyone, he dispatched a messenger to spread the word that gold had been found near present day Rapid City, South Dakota.

The U.S. secretary of War W. W. Belknap announced war with the Lakota on Nov. 22, 1875, "unless something is done to obtain the possession of the Black Hills for the White miners who have been strongly attracted by reports of rich deposits."

On Feb. 7, 1876, the U.S. War Department authorized General Phillip to begin operations against the "hostile Sioux" contending that, "the only good Indian is a dead one."

The U.S. army had not reckoned with the depth of experience and strategic knowledge of the Indian leaders such as Crazy Horse, Hunkpapa and Pizi. The Seventh Cavalry troops were soundly defeated. Unable to defeat the Natives militarily, the U.S. government employed another tactic. They declared the Indians who had not participated in the war, and those who had remained on the land, as prisoners of war.

Rations to the captives were all cut off, pending their signing of a document, "legally" relinquishing title to their land. Approximately 10 percent of the Lakota alive signed in exchange for subsistence rations. The Congress used this as the basis of formally incorporating Lakota land as U.S. property.

Shyamala
IVATURY

The warring Indian soldiers had broken up into small groups to secure forage for their horses and to hunt for winter provisions. This prompted the U.S. government to launch a winter campaign, in which the Indians, immoblized by the cold and snow, were killed village by village. The killing was directed primarly towards the non-combatant elders, women and children. Through the use of deception and lies the U.S. government managed to disarm the soldiers.

The U.S. Congress in 1883 outlawed major Native spiritual ceremonies, Indian children were abducted and stripped to boarding schools where even the speaking of their own language was prohibited.

The Dawes Act of 1887 dissolved traditional Indian custom of using and holding land in common. Instead, each federally recognized Indian was allotted a small amount of land. The surplus land was eaten up by the government. Under this act, half of the Lakota land was lost.

By 1890, Lakota resistance became desperate and though it lacked a military dimension, the revitalization of Lakota culture scared the U.S. government. Troops were again sent and a large number of the Lakota leaders were assassinated.

For the next three decades Lakota resistance remained covert, and in 1924, the Indian Reorganization Act (or the Wheeler-Howard Act) dispensed with the traditional Indian forms of governance and supplemented them with "tribal councils," consciously patterned after corporate boards — once again unilaterally and "for the common good."

The Lakota also made attempts to judicially retrieve their land, refusing monetary compensation. The federal response was that of inaction.

American Indian Movement

In the mid-sixties, a Cherokee college student, Clyde Warrior, asserted a pan-Indian nationalism, "What can you do when a society tells you that you should be non-existant? As I look at it, the situation will not change unless really violent action comes about. If this country understands violence then that is the way to do it. Some of the young Indians are already talking revolution. 'We have tried everything,' they say. 'The only thing left is our guns. Let us use them."

In this atmosphere of political ferment Dennis Banks and George Mitchell, founded the American Indian Movement in 1968, patterned after the Black Panther Party. Within 2 years numerous chapters of the AIM had sprung up throughout the country.

In Nov. 1969, an ad-hoc group called Indians of All Tribes (IAT) occupied Alacatraz Island in San Francisco Bay. Headed by Richard Oaks, a Mohawk, and AIM member, John Trudell, demanded title to Alcatraz under provisions of an act passed in 1882 which said that abandoned federal sites should be used for Indian scools. IAT wanted to establish a center for Native American studies on the island.

"We the Native Americans reclaim the land known as Alcatraz Island in the name of all American Indians by right of discovery . . . We wish to be fair and honorable in our dealings with the Caucasian inhabitants of this land, and here by offer the following treaty . . . We will purchase Alcatraz for $24 in glass, beach and red cloth, a precedent set by the White man's purchase of a similar island about 300 years ago. We know that $24 in trade goods for these 16 acres is more than what was paid when Manhattan Island was sold, but we know that land values have risen over the years. Our offer of $1.24/acre is greater than the 47 cents/acre the White men are now paying the Californian Indians for the land [though the Indian claims commission]."

The publicity around the take-over prompted negotiations on part of the President with a delegated IAT representative. On March 8, 1970 IAT occupied a second site, an unused section of Fort Lawson, near Seattle. Seventy-seven persons were arrested. The site was reoccupied on March 15. The twelve ring leaders were arrested in the ensuing military response. On April 2, the site was reoccupied once again. The 19 month occupation on Alcatraz was systematically destroyed by denying them electricity, water and supplies. The occupation accomplished nothing but brought tremendous public exposure to the issues.

AIM now slowly began to move its base of operations to Pine Ridge, Lakota territory — the home of the Means brothers. They mobolized around the murder of a 51-year-old Oglala named Raymond Yellow Thunder. There had been no investigation regarding his murder either by the Bureau of Indian Affairs, the FBI or even the local police.

The next action that resulted from this was the "Trail of Broken Treaties" in July 1972, in a meeting held in conjunction with the annual Sun Dance. The aim was to bring caravans of Indians from across the country to the BIA building in Washington D.C., prior to the presidential elections in November. The idea was to attract media coverage and use this as a forum for the airing of Indian grievances.

Given the political climate of the country, the leaders of AIM felt that the Nixon administration could be forced into negotiations on the subject of Native American rights.

The caravan arrived at Washington on November 3, 1972. They occupied the BIA building. On Nov. 5, White House representatives agreed to review and respond to the AIM's demands. The police repeatedly harassed the occupants attempting to induce fear and tension. By Nov. 17, the White House reneged on its non-prosecution agreement.

The Pine Ridge Battleground

In the next few years the popularity of AIM grew, so much so that Russell Means announced his desire to run for tribal presidency in 1974. Means' platform focused on Oglala sovereignty, specifically: the return of tribal decision making to the traditional council of elders, a resumption of Lakota treaty making with the U.S. and/or other nations and the elimination of the BIA as the Oglalas liason with the federal government.

The federal government backed Dickie Wilson who was financed to form the GOONs (Guardians of the Oglala Nation) whose purpose was to crush AIM. By early 1973 the FBI offered concrete support to the GOONs. This included material support such as M-16 assault rifles and sophisticated communications ammunition. The vigilante group, with the support of the FBI, committed a large number of crimes such as bombing murders. They were instrumental in Dick Wilson's winning the tribal elections.

The issue of the FBI relationship to the GOONs becomes more troublesome when viewed in the context of being a part of a COINTELPRO calling for active domestic collaboration of the FBI, the CIA and the military — as during the seige of Wounded Knee.

As the antagonism between Means and Wilson came to a head, the AIM leaders suggested a "symbolic contribution" by going en masses to the 1890 massacre site at Wounded Knee, where they would conduct a press conference regarding Lakota rights.

Approximately 200 people arrived at Wounded Knee, making arrangements for the Press conference the next day. By the next morning access to the hamlet of Wounded Knee was cut off by roadblocks made by the GOONs. Soon the Pentagon stepped in.

Since the Civil War it was the first time that the U.S. army had been dispatched in a domestic operation, the Pentagon invaded Wounded Knee with 17 armored personnel carriers, 130,000 rounds of M-16 ammunition, 41,000 rounds of M-1 ammunition, 24,000 flares, 12 M-79 grenade launchers, 600 cases of C-S gas, 100 rounds of M-40 explosives, helicopters, Phantom jets all under the direction of General Alexander Haig, then Vice-Chief of Staff at the Pentagon.

In the subsequent showdown there were a large number of killings and over 1,200 arrests. The U.S. government tried its best to conceal the illegal military involvement, the blatant violation of the rights of AIM members. The FBI justified its actions that AIM was a public menance, a "violence prone" or even "violent" entity. Clearly, this is FBI fabrication, and media manipulation.

Today little has been done to secure the rights of the Lakota people. Through a pattern of duplicity intermingled with raw forces, the United States has colonized the Native Americans and quelled all resistance to colonization. AIM leaders such as Leonard Peltier still remains in jail, in maximum security.

The FBI's COINTELPRO has also been responsible for the destruction of the Chicano and Puerto Rican movements from 1972-74, the women's movement, the civil rights movement, gay and lesbian movements, the anti-war movements and labor movements. Domestic cover action has become a permanent feature of the U.S. government.

The U.S. is based on structural inequalities along class, race and gender lines. The state security apparatus ensures these inequalities by use of extreme and unjustified force.

Schmoozing in the Big Apple

So they say "You learn something new everyday." Well, recently when I went to Manhattan I learned two things: First, I learned that not all New Yorkers are self-involved snobs. The second thing I learned was a saying commonly used amongst Hollywood types: being called "bi" (we'll explain this in a moment).

Anyhow, my day in Manhattan was one of those boring days that turned out to be invigorating and exciting. My day began by walking from my brother's Upper East Side apartment to 59th and "Lex" to Bloomingdales.

Adam Scott
ROBERTS

As I searched for the latest styles from Joseph Abboud and Girbaud I was asked to take a moment to rate two denim shirts. These were the ugliest shirts and definitely not worth the $98 that they were priced for. I couldn't help but laugh when asked what I'd change about shirt A: I said "Axe the buttons — the pockets — the butt-ugly color and forget the shirt." My reward wasn't a free shirt rather a small pad of paper from Marithe Francious Girbaud. Who ever said "You can't get something for nothing?"

The next stop was Urban Outfitters on 59th, which definitely blows away any U.O. store I've been to. Anyhow, the styles were very into the "grunge look" which is already out. The latest thing is called "Phat" which is a really hip style straight out of SoHo. My friend Jeff can explain that if you have any questions.

Well, since I was an uncle-in-waiting I decided to go pre-uncling at none other than F.A.O. Shwarz. I always enjoy the music that greets the kids within us "Welcome to our world, welcome to our world, welcome to our world of toys." I ventured throughout the Troll section, the teddy bear section, the airplanes and all the other little things that are so much fun to see at F.A.O.

As I passed "Barbie on Madison" I laughed. The last time I went to F.A.O. was with my closest and dearest friend, Stephanie. She wanted to go to "Barbie on Madison" and I told her I didn't know where it was (although I really did know). Hey, I really didn't want to know what the lastest in Barbie fashion was. Steph, it's Barbie and the Rexettes! Sorry! On the other hand, I definitely found some things that I will definitely buy for my future nephew Jake, or if it's a girl, Samantha.

The highlight of my day was on Madison Avenue. Shoppers, models, tourists and pan-handlers surrounded me as I entered H20, a Chicago based store of natural skin products (It's very Details, GQ, Esquire.) The beautiful sales women named Dierdre helped me pick out the proper foot rub that I wanted. Fine, it was only $9.20 but I decided to put some mileage onto my Air Miles Mastercard. As she took my card from me she said (as she looked at the card) "Adam Scott Roberts, what a beautiful name. Are you in the film industry?" What an ego booster. So there we were shmoozing about my name and L.A. I told her I was from Boston and that everyone thinks I'm from Loooong Isssland. She said

Inside scoop on the movie nobody's talking about

WARNING: This article reveals "the secret" of "The Crying Game." If you haven't seen the movie yet, don't read this. If you do and it wrecks the experience, don't blame me. – JL

By JON LUPO
Collegian Staff

You're sitting in the theater watching The Crying Game, trying to stay one step ahead of the plot, anticipating a shocker of a twist while the repentant IRA agent Fergus (Stephen Rea) woos the former girlfriend of his recently desceased prisoner Jody (Forest match-up, right — sort of a reversed Bodyguard with English accents?

Then, out of the blue, a gentle hush falls over the crowd. You can hear the sound of the heater hum, the projector whirl, a pin drop. It's the sound of utter disbelief and the rug being pulled from under you.

It may be the secret that's packing them into the theaters all across the nation, but it's writer/director Neil Jordan's entire film that casts its serpentine, haunting spell on moviegoers.

A spell that's earned this independent foreign film across the board acclaim, six surprise Academy Award nominations, outstanding box office and an assured place in pop culture history as the one movie in recent memory that's beguiled everyone. To know the secret is a privelege, to not is lucky, for you'll have the chance to experience The Crying Game for the first time.

The mystery of the secret and the promise of an original twist has been key in enticing audiences in — and keeping them talking about it.

An extraordinary word of mouth (most of them kept shut in reference to the big secret) has made The Crying Game the sleeper that woke up — with a vengeance. For a $5 million film that no one in Hollywood wanted to make, the film has exceeded everyone's expectations.

From writer/director Jordan, whose two Hollywood ventures suffered intense studio interference, to the unknown Jaye Davidson, whose once-in-a-lifetime performance earned him an Oscar nomination, no one could've known that a quiet film about love, identity and things that are "in my nature" would go this far.

Far indeed. According to figures released Tuesday, The Crying Game has officially broken the so-called art-house box office ceiling of $25 million, raking in over $28 million in moderate release and landing a fourth place slot in the overall box office figures.

The Crying Game is a sort of sweet revenge for Jordan, who has been stuck in a rut of Hollywood films that didn't work out. His stellar work as writer and director of 1986's acclaimed film Mona Lisa led to the disastrous High Spirits in 1988. He made another attempt to work within Hollywood with 1989's We're No Angels, which proved less than heavily. Despite a top-grade cast (including Robert DeNiro and Demi Moore) and an acclaimed writer (David Mamet), the film flopped.

"Mona Lisa showed he could make a commercial success," says Amherst College film professor Helen von Schmidt. "But when he went to Hollywood, they didn't know what to do with him and he wisely went home."

Jordan worked on different drafts of what was to become The Crying Game and made a comeback of sorts with 1991's The Miracle, with Beverly D'Angelo. After the art-house success of that film, he went to work full time on the film that would give him the most acclaim.

Jordan claims he wrote the film with Rea and Whitaker in the back of his mind. For the part of Dil, Jordan combed England until he met the 24-year-old unemployed fashion assistant at a party.

And the rest, as they say, is history. Jordan credits the audience for keeping such an irresistable secret and Miramax, the film's distributor, for a masterful ad campaign.

According to Dwayne Robinson, director of The Academy of Music Theater in Northampton (the area's only showing), the audiences have been "very good" about keeping the secret. Robinson explains that, over its eight-week run, only about ten people have walked out.

Along with word of mouth comes a watershed of hype and neither Jordan nor Miramax are complaining of the film's almost constant attention. But some feel while the hype certainly helps promote the film, it might be mislaid.

"I'm sorry that it's being hyped for the wrong reasons," says von Schmidt. "The really good thing about that film is not in fact the surprise, but the fact that it's a film that has a grown up vision about things."

Sophomore theater major Jeff Clouter feels that the hype is different than other much-publicized movies like Batman or Dick Tracy. "In the cases of those movies, you can merchandise the hype. You can't sell Crying Game tee-shirts," he says.

Then I guess Jaye Davidson action figures are out of the question.

"It's about identity," von Schmidt argues. "Who we are, who other people are and the ways in which we determine that."

Von Schmidt admits that very few films can successfully explore the whole question of categories, whether they be racial, political or sexual.

"The most shocking moment in the film for me, is not when Jaye Davidson takes off his clothes, but the moment when Miranda Richardson takes her gun and just whips Forest Whitaker's face — I jumped right in my chair," says von Schmidt.

"Because what you see is that terrorism depends on refusing to see the other as a human being," she says. "That's the question the all the way through: except you get hung up on questions about how you identify people — as Protestant or Catholic, Irish or English, or even male and female — and how you can lose sight what really constitutes a human being."

The sticky part comes when evaluating the complex relationship between Fergus and Dil — and then trying to sort out Jody's place in the unique love triangle that eventually develops.

Junior BDIC major Sue Foti believes that, though she felt the film placed too much on the twist of the plot, the movie did make her think, especially about love relationships."

"They were done really well," says Foit. "It challenges you to rethink views about homosexuality."

As a heterosexual man, Clouter thought the film brought many latent issues to light.

"I asked myself: am I in love with the person or does it matter what the sex was?" he says.

Von Schmidt argues that very few films can asks these kinds of questions as effectively as The Crying Game. "Almost none," she says.

Despite Jordan's past problems with big-studio productions, he'll follow up his present success with the much-postponed film version of Anne Rice's Interview With A Vampire, with Brad Pitt set to star and Daniel Day Lewis rumored for a co-starring role. Stephen Rea is currently starring on Broadway in Someone Who'll Watch Over Me, while big surprise Jaye Davidson, Oscar nomination or not, is keeping a low profile. I just can't wait to see what he'll wear to the Academy Awards.

"Definitely not. You don't have a Boston or a New York accent rather you look and speak very L.A." Ego booster #2!

I told her I wanted to make controversial films. She said "Like killer bisexual Clinique counter girls?" "No, I said." It turns out that she was a make-up artist for films. Here I was with a 27-year-old SoHo beauty flirting with me. Only in New York I guess?

Anyhow, she said "Everyone in the business is BI. It's really fun and convenient. Are you going to do the bi-thing?" I looked at her dumbfounded and was thinking, "Is she talking about sexuality?" Fortunately, she blurted out Bi. . . coastal! Oh, now it made sense to me. Bi-coastal. I told her I wanted to live at the Beresford on Central Park West. However, if I do become "BI" (coastal!) I'd buy a posh home in Holmby Hills (in Beverly Hills), California.

The time spent kibbitzing about films and Manhattan's club scene was so fulfilling. I only had to spend $9.20 to have a good day. Isn't life great! But, then again "I'm very L.A."

As the World Trade Center Terror dominated the news and the cities lights illuminated the skyline I finished studying my fer my Macroeconomics 104 exam. Wouldn't Mr. Resnick be proud! I actually studied while in New York. Miracles do happen.

I got dressed for my evening "clubbing." However, where would I go this time? The Palladium, Limelight, or the new Club U.S.A.? Well, tonight I was in the mood for the New Amsterdam. Well, I grabbed my keys, spritzed on some JOOP! and hopped into the elevator. The doorman Jack said "Have fun!" as he held the door open for me. As I left the chandelier filled lobby I waved down a taxi and told him to take me to the Upper West Side. I was off to meet my friend Liz and her friends at the club. It was a bi-side evening. Where east-side meets west-side. Isn't life great!

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): A good day to separate the wheat from the chaff. Real kernels of information surface in the sifting of recent events. The only answer to a relationship stalemate is flexibility.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): A satisfactory agreement can be reached regarding a family matter. Keep personal problems strictly private. Coworkers help by showing more understanding.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Try to clarify instructions before getting involved in an important project. You can rely on your mate for financial advice. Devoting more time to the needs of older family members pays off.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Your creativity and resourcefulness come to the forefront. An innovative approach helps solve an old problem. There is a new emphasis on the basics.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): The pace accelerates at your place of business. Plan your day so that you have plenty of time to get to important appointments. Word your correspondence so it says exactly what you mean.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): An outstanding day for romantic relationships. A short business trip will promote your career or financial aims. If making investments, take a long-range view.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): An unusual business offer is featured. Keep your personal enthusiasm for a risky venture under control. In family conflicts, be willing to make certain concessions.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Sharing a secret with your mate leads to deeper rapport. Dress traditionally for an appointment with a conservative person. You find yourself thrust into the limelight.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): A busy day lies ahead. Present your creative ideas to the right people. A business associate could begin to vies you as a potential romantic partner.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): A predawn hunch about a business or vocational project could point the way to success. Avoid discussing topics that could lead to bickering with a loved one.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Although it is easy to reach an agreement with your mate or a friend this morning, you could run into a stumbling block later in the day. Promote a special writing project.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Travel or social prospects may have you keyed up, probably because of the romantic implications. If you're turning 21 today, be careful when you party. Certain substances may augment the effects of alcoholic beverages.

Cal's hoping to avoid the 1 p.m. contest and took a shot at the A-10 office saying they should realize the Minutemen are the "marquee" team of the league. There's a few teams who might have something to say about that.

The Montreal Canadians have clinched the NHL's first playoff spot. With the Hartford Whalers and Ottawa Senators having tough seasons, the Nordiques, Bruins and Sabres will follow Montreal soon. The Norris, Smythe and Patrick division races will all go down to the wire, with at least five teams competing for each division's four playoff spots.

If Disney really decides to name their Anaheim expansion team "The Mighty Ducks," they should lose their franchise. From the showing of the current crop of expansion teams, perhaps the "Dead Ducks" would be more appropriate. Most seven-year-olds in youth hockey would be embarrassed to play for a team with that name.

Naming a franchise after a youth hockey team from a kids' movie is not going to command much respect. What would baseball fans have said if the Florida expansion team decided to dub themselves the "Bad News Bears"? The Mighty Ducks are no different. I don't even want to see the jersey. Michael Eisner, don't embarrass yourself or the NHL.

Next Tuesday is the Pay-Per-View (NESN) fight of the month, live from the Igloo in Pittsburgh. The heavyweight bout will feature Cam Neely versus Ulf Samuelsson. Rumor has it that there will be a pretty good hockey game as the undercard. Check it out.

Minutewomen victorious in home finale

CHRISTOPHER EVANS / COLLEGIAN

Kim Gregory and the University of Massachusetts women's basketball team rounded out their home schedule last night against Boston University.

By JEFF HOJLO
Collegian Staff

Going into the final home game of the 1992-1993 season last night in the Cage, head coach Joanie O'Brien and the rest of the University of Massachusetts women's basketball team were determined to give seniors Kim Kristofik and Gloria Nevarez a win as a going-away present.

When the final buzzer sounded, the Minutewomen had done just that, defeating a tough Boston University squad, 63-56, thanks to some gritty defense and clutch shots down the stretch.

"Kim and Gloria have been through some of the worst times since they've been here," said O'Brien, speaking of the combined 4-51 team record over the past two years. "They've both stuck with the program and didn't quit, so we owed them our best effort tonight."

Early in the second half, BU crept back in the game with a 9-2 run, highlighted by two Annemarie Olson (18 pts) baskets. UMass, in obvious disarray on the defensive end, called time out to try to regroup. Olson struck again though, promptly canning a three-pointer to trim the Massachusetts lead to one, at 41-40.

But a Kristofik basket off a nice feed from Octavia Thomas (19 pts, 10 rebs), coupled with a Tricia Hopson three helped the Minutewomen to a six-point advantage and UMass seemed to be in control. BU would not die, though.

At the 5:17 mark, two free throws by Jill Sosnik (team-high 20 pts, seven rebs) gave BU their first lead of the night (51-50) and the crowd seemed stunned. The lead was short lived however, as six points down the stretch by Thomas and a couple of tough hoops by Kristofik sealed the win for the Minutewomen.

"This is a big win because it gives us a positive feeling going into Rhode Island on Saturday," said O'Brien. "Kim (Kristofik) played well, Trish (Hopson) was solid at the point and Gloria (Nevarez) came off the bench and really provided a spark."

In the first half, three jumpers by Melissa Gurile (10 pts, five rebs) and a Kristofik layup had UMass out to an early 8-2 lead and it looked as if the Minutewomen would run away with a victory. BU fought back, though, getting as close as a point with 7:49 left in the first half.

But a Nevarez (four points) hoop started the Massachusetts engine up again and coach O'Brien and company had a 34-24 lead at the half. Some tough defense limited BU to an abyssmal 33.3 percent shooting as opposed to 55.6% for the red-hot Minutewomen.

HOOP NOTES: Kristofik on her last home game: "Everyone's asking me if I'm sad, but I'm not; we've had a great season and this program is on the up-and-up. I'm looking forward to seeing UMass in the Final Four in the next few years."

A-10 teams look for NCAA respect

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

With the NCAA Tournament only two weeks away, the biggest question around the Atlantic 10 is, "How many conference teams will receive invitations to the Big Dance?"

The most common answer, four, would be the most bids ever for the A-10.

"I think we'll get four," University of Massachusetts coach John Calipari said. "Four definitely deserve to go, and the rest of the top seven deserve to go to the NIT."

St. Joseph's coach John Griffin said, "We deserve four bids. I think the only problem is that besides UMass, we have all beaten each other up and that may hurt us."

The A-10 is currently ranked as the fourth toughest conference in the nation by the RPI Power Rankings, which is used by the NCAA Tournament Selection Committee. The Big East is ranked sixth.

Consider Massachusetts (19-6, 10-3 in conference) a lock. Four teams, St. Joseph's (17-8, 8-5), George Washington (18-6, 7-5), Rhode Island (16-9, 7-6) and Temple (14-11, 7-6), will battle for the other three bids this weekend at the A-10 Championships in Philadelphia.

West Virginia (15-10, 6-7) and Rutgers (13-12, 6-6) are both coming on strong but will likely need to win the conference tournament in order to stay out of the NIT. St. Bonaventure's (10-15, 0-13) season will likely end on Sunday, when it meets UMass in the opening round.

"It's unlikely many of us will win 20 games, but if the rankings are true and leagues below us get four bids, then we should get them also," Griffin said.

Calipari handicaps the tournament field as such: "West Virginia is the hottest team, GW, St. Joe's and Temple are just behind them, Rutgers and Rhode Island are the next hottest and then us and St. Bonaventure.

"Over the last three games, we are playing worse then any team in the conference," he said.

• Road games are always difficult, but St. Joe's had to overcome more than just airline food and hostile fans for its Feb. 22 victory over St. Bonaventure in Olean, N.Y.

The Hawks flew to Buffalo, about an hour west of Olean, in a snow storm. Their flight was delayed and their bus driver in Buffalo asked the airline if their flight was cancelled. The airline mistakenly said yes, so the bus left for Olean without them.

After landing and finding no bus, Griffin called for a new bus, which arrived two hours later. The bus creeped along in the driving snow until it approached a bridge, where a snow plow sent a wave of snow over the edge of the bridge, hitting the bus squarely and smashing in its windshield. Two hours later, another bus finally picked the Hawks up and got them to their hotel.

• Yinka Dare captured his eighth Rookie of the Week honor Sunday and will likely be a unanimous selection for A-10 Rookie of the Year.

• The A-10 may be in line for a Thursday night game of the week on ESPN II next season, if the second all-sports network gets off the ground in time.

• In the wake of Mike Williams broken hand (out three weeks), Calipari said he may be forced to play senior forward Tony Barbee at point guard. Barbee will man the point only if Derek Kellogg and Chris Robinson encounter foul trouble or are not playing up to par.

Scott's shots

As we go to press, pitchers are still a little ahead of hitters. It is unclear what this means for the Red Sox who have yet to distinguish their pitchers from their hitters.

• It's safe to say that Coach Cal is doing a bit more than mere game preparation. It appears he is focusing on his players' attitudes and their will to win.

David
SCOTT

At one point during Monday's game Dana Dingle was summoned to check in and he casually strolled to the scorer's table to await a stoppage in play.

"Dana, you sprint to the table," Calipari screamed and rest assured Dingle got the message. By the way, Calipari called Dingle "the most pleasant surprise of the year," and while his numbers may not raise eyebrows, Dingle has certainly been aggressive.

• Who's got the cast-making contract for the Minutemen this year? (Can't you see it now? The "Official Cast of the 1992-93 Minutemen.")

Without Mike Williams in the line-up, Cal is looking for someone to step up and fill the role.

Coach, I've got some eligibility left and you said you were looking for a good "break-down" player. Heck, I break down every time I step on the court.

I'll be at the Montague Inn if you need me.

• Didn't Nelson Richards have a long stint on "Match Game?" Maybe that was his brother, Charles Nelson Riley.

• I'm going to be an uncle come April and we're having some trouble finding a name suitable for my sister's first child. We figure a good sports name will pave the way for a fruitful life, witness the rhyming Shaquille O'Neal. The last name will be Dennis and the frontrunner thus far is a tribute to a member of the All-Name hoop team, Fennis Dembo. Do you like Fennis Dennis? Well, then you think of something, tough guy.

I'm enlisting the help of my reader(s). The name should be gender neutral and very marketable. Results of the naming contest (either real or made-up) will appear when published.

• The battle for Cravat King is coming down to March Madness, also know as Cravat Craziness, and late entrants are coming from everywhere. UMass swimming coach Russ Yarworth was petitioning for

UM hires new tennis head coach

Judy Dixon has been named the University of Massachusetts women's head tennis coach as announced Feb. 19 by UMass athletic director Bob Marcum.

The UMass women's tennis team will begin competition this spring with an eight-match schedule, beginning April 1.

Dixon brings a wealth of tennis experience to UMass. Dixon, a 1973 graduate of the University of Southern California, has competed in the U.S. Open, Wimbledon and on the Virginia Slims Tour in her professional career.

She also served as a clinician for the United States Tennis Association (USTA) from 1975-80 and a coach for the USTA Area Training Center in 1990. From 1988-90, Dixon was ranked No. 1 in New England in singles and doubles in the Women's 40s division.

From 1973-76, Dixon served as the coordinator of women's athletics and women's varsity tennis coach at Yale University.

In 1975, Dixon became the first woman nominated for an Emmy Award in Sports Broadcasting for her PBS color commentary.

Neely's return a victory for teammates and fans

"Just wait until Neely gets back!"

This has been the hopeful cry of many Boston hockey fans during the hometown team's up and down 1992-93 campaign. The whole NHL has been waiting to see if the Bruins' poster child would return from the leg injury that sidelined him for the better part of the last two seasons.

Matt
VAUTOUR

Thursday night against the Minnesota North Stars, Cam Neely made his return in front of a frenzied sold-out Boston Garden.

Questions surrounded his comeback. He had been a two-time, fifty goal scorer. Would Neely be the offensive threat that he had been? In his first two games since returning to the Bruins' line up he has already notched two goals. He had been the true power forward.

His trademark was his aggressive hitting. Would the fear of re-injuring his leg keep Neely from being the fearless hitter that he had been before the injury? After Saturday's game, many a Washington Capital felt sore from a Neely check.

The Bruins' winning goal in overtime came as a result of a Capital defenseman coughing up the puck to avoid being pummeled by Neely. When number 8 is skating right wing in Beantown, the Bruins are on the rise. No doubt about it, Cam is back.

Around the NHL:

They were a franchise on the rise. The St. Louis Blues had two of hockey's hottest young superstars in Brett Hull and Adam Oates and a developing young defense poised for future success. The Blues not only contended for the Norris division title, but were in the running for the best record in the NHL as well. It seemed only a matter of time before Lord Stanley's Cup came to St. Louis.

Now, two seasons later, the Blues have fallen on hard times. They traded a disgruntled Adam Oates to Boston for playmaker Craig Janney and defenseman Stephane Quintal. Hull, who hasn't been quite the scorer he was without Oates feeding him, has been critical of St. Louis management and has become the focal point in many trade rumors.

The Blues find themselves in fifth place, and currently out of the playoff picture. Perhaps trading Hull for players, cash and draft picks is the answer. The Blues will be a team to watch as the March 15th trading deadline draws near.

Also on the topic of trades, the Edmonton Oilers traded away another veteran star to avoid paying a high salary. They sent Joe Murphy to the Blackhawks for Igor Kravchuck. The latest Oiler trade rumor has Edmonton sending Dave Manson to Quebec for Valeri Kamensky. Watch for the Rangers also to be active as the trading deadline approaches, probably

O'Brien looks forward to 'quiet' last semester

By ALYSSA M. OWENS
Collegian Staff

Chancellor's awards for minorities and a Chancellor's advisory board on gay, lesbian and bisexual affairs illustrate the effort to improve multiculturalism on the University of Massachusetts campus in the wake of a tension-filled fall semester, said Chancellor Richard O'Brien last night.

"We've had a terrible fall. I hope that this will be a relatively quiet spring," said O'Brien, in an address to the Undergraduate Student Senate.

"The work with the [Lesbian Bisexual Gay Alliance] has been pretty successful. We're putting together an advisory board to express concerns and meet student needs," said O'Brien.

Chancellor awards of $1,000 each for a minority student, staff member and faculty member are planned for this semester, with an awards ceremony to be held in April or May, O'Brien said.

O'Brien said an investigation and report is being prepared concerning the University's Upward Bound Program, which lost its federal funding last spring.

Upward Bound is a long standing program for assisting low-income high school students.

O'Brien said the University's budget for fiscal year '94 looks promising.

"When Gov. Weld made his proposal in January to increase funding, it looked very good," said O'Brien.

Since the University sets its budget before the state, it is difficult to know how much and where funds should be appropriated, O'Brien said.

"We're caught in a terrible box," said O'Brien. "I do expect there to be a 2 to 3 percent increase in tuition and fees at the University, part of which will be funding for the Mullins Center."

O'Brien said the increase will also be used toward hiring more faculty members, to compensate for the many layoffs in recent years.

Increases in funding for athletics are set for fiscal year '94 also, O'Brien said.

"Next year about one million and a half more will be spent on athletics," O'Brien said. "Part of this is necessary to comply to Title XI, which calls for equal funding for men's and women's athletics. I also hope that men's tennis can be reinstated."

Official says Serbs suspect in tower blast

By LARRY McSHANE
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Investigators in the World Trade Center bombing are giving the most credence to a Serbian militant groups's claim of responsibility, an FBI official said Wednesday.

Attempts to find clues in the rubble beneath the world's second-tallest buildings stalled because of the threat of a cave-in. Workers won't be able to remove any more debris before Friday evening, Police Commissioner Raymond Kelly said.

Also on Wednesday, authorities said the towers wouldn't reopen until April.

The first call of responsibility after Friday's bombing came from a man who identified himself as from the Serbian Liberation Front, and he "seemed to have information that hadn't been out there," the official said.

That information was a reference to the level of the garage beneath the trade center where the

Panelists urge society to rethink economic system

Angela Davis, the keynote speaker at the first Annual Women's Conference entitled "Empowering Women: Prospects and Challenges for the 21st Century," focused on rethinking global struggles while using political agencies to become aware of worldly issues.

"We are standing on the shoulders of women and men who have carved out a way for us," said Davis, "Our roles are political agents participating in progressive efforts in tradition. We will move into the next century when capitalism ends."

The conference was held on Saturday, Feb. 27, 1993 in the Lincoln Campus Center at the University of Massachusetts. The Conference was organized by graduate and undergraduate women at UMass to call attention to the political, cultural, economical and physical violence against women, particularly women of color and low income women.

Davis, political activist, author, women's right advocate and professor of the history of consciousness department at the University of California at Santa Cruz, was strong and clear in her message, as were the other speakers at the conference.

Davis was one of many speakers at the conference of nine panels that looked at subjects like "Media Images of Women," "Women from Developing Nations" and "Violence Against Women."

The panel on "Women in the Economy" challenged people to rethink the "so-called" economy, the industrial policy, the production of consumption and the environment, the welfare policy and aid to families with dependent children.

"We must acknowledge that women have two work places, the home and the office," said Valerie Voorheis, a speaker on the panel. Lisa Saunders cited statistics and said, "We must examine the industrial policy as a response to falling wages of men and rising wages for women."

Denise Johnson addressed issues of the environment. "There are toxic waste sites being located in the Black, Hispanic and Native American communities around the world," said Johnson, "The ignorance of that fact is disempowering, and we need to rethink our system."

The women on the panel received positive feedback from the audience, but the speaker who overwhelmed them was Laura Rock, a member of the Women's Alliance for Economic Justice.

"I don't have a Ph.D., or any of that, but I'm here to speak because I am an angry welfare mother," said Rock.

Turco, Fazzi promise to be tough yet accessible

• Fazzi wants 'representative' gov't

By ALYSSA M. OWENS
Collegian Staff

The average student deserves to be represented by student government, said Jennifer Fazzi, a candidate for student government president.

"I see the role of student government as being representative to the student body as a whole," Fazzi said. "Students are paying an awful lot of money to go to this school and they deserve to have their concerns addressed."

Although voting ballots do not list "running mates" — all candidates are listed singly — Fazzi said she and student trustee candidate Jeff Turco have a common view of student needs and areas of concern for the Senate.

Student government needs someone with political clout who will represent overall student needs, said student trustee candidate Jeff Turco.

"The average student doesn't have time to put in the effort for fighting for their own interests," Turco said. "The student government must let those students be heard."

Turco said he supports the reorganization of the Student Activities Office and Trust Fund.

"The idea behind that office is to address the importance and needs of the students themselves," said Turco. "Every member of the Student Activities Office

UMass Police Log

Compiled by BrianGormley
Recent incidents recorded by the University's Department of Public Safety.

ACCIDENT

• A PVTA bus was struck on the front end by a vehicle on Presidents Drive Monday night. The collision occurred when the bus tried to pass the vehicle which was backing into a parking space. Estimated damage to the vehicle was $1000.

LARCENY

• An individual in Melville reported her bicycle stolen Monday afternoon. The bicycle was stolen from the bike rack. The bike was valued at $155.

• Tuesday afternoon, an individual reported her wallet stolen from the employee's coat room in the Campus Center Store. There was $675 worth of cash and check in the wallet. Two other employees reported cash stolen from their wallets in the same coat room. The theft is under investigation.

VANDALISM

• Homophobic graffiti was found in the University Library Tuesday morning. The graffiti was written on a wall in the men's bathroom on the 22nd floor.

• Obscene graffiti was found in Coolidge Tuesday afternoon. The graffiti was written on a stall in the men's room on the 7th floor.

DISTURBANCE

• Tuesday night, staff at the Worcester Dining Commons received a threatening note. The note was left in the suggestion box of the Berkshire Dining Commons.

■ chancellor

O'Brien said he has seen good changes during his two years at the University, but it hasn't been easy.

"Don't think that all of my personal aspirations have been met in being your chancellor," O'Brien said. "It's a hell of a bad job."

The Student Senate discussed revamping Student Activities at UMass.

There's been a feeling that the Student Activities Office is drawing too much from the Student Activities Trust Fund," said Emily Rose, treasurer of the student government.

A proposal has been made by the vice chancellor to reduce the Student Activities Fee by $33 and increase the curriculum fee by the same amount for fiscal year '94. Those funds would be used to cover all expenses for the Student Activities Office. The total payroll for the SAO would be split by the curriculum fee and the state.

"I see this proposal as an ushering in of a new area of student government and student empowering on campus," said Mike Poster, speaker of the Senate.

If the proposal is passed, it would mean the SATF would be used exclusively to fund Registered Student Organizations and student business and agencies on campus.

"We won't have the administration sucking up over a third of the SATF," Poster said. "Total control of the funds would be given to students."

bomb was detonated, the official, who has been involved said on condition of anonymity.

The phone call came little more than an hour after the bombing, and it wasn't until several hours later that authorities disclosed where the bomb had exploded.

At a news conference Wednesday, James Fox, head of the FBI's New York office, said about the call: "There was no unique information in it. The only thing the guy said was, 'This is no accident.'"

Of a possible Serbian connection, the source said: "That's the most likely direction and that's the first place they're looking."

Radovan Karadzic, the leader of Bosnian Serbs and a delegate to U.N. talks in New York aimed at bringing peace to the former Yugoslavia, has denied that his people were involved.

The blast apparently occurred on a ramp on the B2 level of the underground parking garage, Capt. Walter Boser of the police Bomb Squad said Wednesday. Authorities wouldn't discuss the significance of the location.

The Muslim fundamentalist group Hamas issued a statement Wednesday in Jordan denying involvement in the blast and requesting an apology. Fox mentioned Hamas a day earlier as among groups under investigation.

State Department spokesman Richard Boucher said that the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, a group Kelly mentioned as also under investigation, probably wasn't responsible for the blast.

Fox said he expected the investigation to be lengthy. "Bombing investigations in the past, where we didn't have a real breakthough, have taken years" He said that just searching though the rubble could take three or four months."

One of the latest theories under consideration: The bombers might have died in the blast below the twin towers. At least five people died and more than 1,000 were injured in the lunchtime explosion. One man remains missing.

The dead-bombers theory is based on a smell of corpses picked up at the blast site, where one building employee remained missing Wednesday.

Grads upset with Whitmore offer

By MICHAEL WEBBER
Collegian Staff

It is time for members of the University of Massachusetts Graduate Employees Organization to negotiate a new contract with the University, and some of the administration's proposals have got them up in arms.

Although both sides have agreed not to "negotiate in the press," Graduate Employee Organization members have made no secret of the fact they are not happy with suggestions the administrators have made and are planning a rally for Tuesday to "show the administration we are serious about what we want," GEO speaker Jack Chang said.

The current contract, which expires June 30, was arrived upon only after intense negotiations and a graduate employee strike last year. Chang said it was too early to consider striking again, but that GEO is determined to have a satisfactory contract.

Topping the list of administration proposals GEO finds unacceptable are the replacement of graduate employee health fee exemptions with stipend increases, the elimination of funding for eight GEO employees and the removal of research assistants from the bargaining unit, Chang said.

The bargaining unit refers to the group of graduate employees represented by GEO.

"If they succeed at removing the research assistants from the bargaining unit, [RAs] will have to pay all of the health fee, they will have to pay the curriculum fee and they won't have binding arbitration," Chang said.

Associate Chancellor Susan Pearson, who heads Whitmore's negotiating team, declined comment on either side's proposals, citing an agreement between GEO and the administration not to discuss the issues publicly.

Still, GEO member Mitchell Kotler, who heads the negotiating team, emphasized formal negotiations have not yet begun. He said although he was "not saying [the administration's] is a good proposal which we should accept," he was optimistic about prospects for working out an agreement at the bargaining table.

"We're going to try the formal negotiating procedure. I think rallies, sit-ins and media events should only be a last resort," Kotler said.

GEO and the administration exchanged lists of proposals for changes in the new contract last Wednesday and briefly explained the reasons behind them, but neither side has given the other any formal feedback, Kotler said.

GEO's proposals include increasing the number of minority graduate employees, decreasing the size of lab and discussion sections and teaching foreign graduate employees about racism in the United States and methods for responding to it.

The negotiating teams will be meeting regularly on Fridays for the rest of the semester. Kotler and Pearson both said they hoped to reach an agreement by the time the old contract runs out.

Vote on new student gov't constitution nears

By MARK PRESTON
Collegian Staff

The undergraduate student body at the University of Massachusetts next week will decide whether or not to support a recognized legal Constitution for the Student Government Association.

According to Jennifer Wood, student government president, the Board of Trustees have "never recognized a student government constitution."

See related story, page 7

The constitution, however, was ratified last December by the Undergraduate Student Senate, which is the first step toward the document becoming legally recognized. If the referendum passes during the March 9 and 10 student government elections, it will be forwarded to the Board of Trustees for approval.

"When the constitution is passed it will put us in a situation where the University administration recognizes us as an advocate for student rights," Wood said.

Student Trustee Kevin Newnan said the Board of Trustees have not yet seen the current version of the constitution, though they are aware it will be presented to them on the June agenda.

Wood said, "The constitution has a basic foundation with solid components and is modeled after the constitution currently in place at UMass-Boston."

The constitution was mainly drawn up by Newnan and Keith Nicholson, the former student attorney general, with the help of other student government officers in October.

There is skepticism among some members of the Student Senate, including Wood, about the probability of it passing. "I don't expect this to pass, because I am sure there has got to be something somewhere that will bother someone," Wood said. "In the very least we are looking for concrete criticisms to help build upon it, but I will be ecstatic if it passes."

If the constitution is defeated by the Board of Trustees, it will be immediately revised with changes in place so that it can be put on the agenda in early October. The constitution will take immediate effect once it is passed by the trustees.

The UMass student government never needed a recognized constitution before 1973, when it was required as a result of the Board's passage of the Wellman Document.

The Wellman Document was a statement put forth by the Board of Trustees which required student governance bodies to have a constitution recognized by the trustees.

"It is very clear what the role of the SGA will be and where it will fit into the process of decisions which affect the lives of students everyday on this campus, when this constitution is passed," Wood concluded.

'Conehead' trustee to exit without too many regrets

By MARK PRESTON
Collegian Staff

He has been the student trustee for the University of Massachusetts at Amherst for the past two years. However, he may be more famous for his antics at UMass basketball games than the work he has done for the student body.

Kevin Newnan might be the only person to hold the office of student trustee for two consecutive years, but more than likely, he will be remembered for his head.

Newnan said one day he was sitting in his office when he received a call from a national magazine which focuses on administrative issues on college campuses. Thinking the call regarded an administrative issue, he put a serious look on his face ready to tackle any questions the caller had. He said he burst out laughing when he found

Treatment of women by media said unfair

By KRISTIN J. ST. JOHN
Collegian Staff

"We spend a lot of time focused on beauty," warned Meddy Cahill, a UMass communications graduate student, in a panel discussion on Media Images of Women during last weekend's Women's Conference.

Joined by Tiffany Devitt and Dr. Barbara Nimri Aziz, Cahill told a crowded room about the negative or non-coverage women get in today's media.

Cahill centered her presentation on Hollywood's perception that beautiful women can get everything they want. She demonstrated this by showing scenes from classic Hollywood films of the '40s and some more recent films.

One movie Cahill touched upon was A League Of Their Own. She pointed out a character named Gooch. In the beginning of the movie she was ugly and nobody paid attention to her. But, when the rest of the women on her team rolled her hair and gave her a dress, Gooch all of a sudden found love and marriage.

Cahill said as women "a lot of us are fleeing the penalty of ugliness." She said she feels that too many use Hollywood as an example of how women should dress, look and feel, which is dangerous.

Devitt, the managing editor of Extra, spoke on the "institutionalized oppression of women in the news media." She cited a recent study that said women make up less than 10 percent of the people written about, or even quoted, on the front page of The New York Times.

One issue Cahill discussed was the media coverage of domestic violence.

"Domestic violence is the number one health problem for U.S. women," she said.

She went on to say that one third of all women murdered in the United States are killed by husbands and boyfriends. One fourth of all suicide attempts are preceded by violence, and that number rises to one-half for African-Americans.

Cahill added that drug prevention receives approximately 22 times more media coverage than domestic violence.

It was also pointed out that with the over 1,500 articles that dealt with abortion over a two-year period, more articles dealt with how abortion affected candidacies of political officials, not how it affects women.

Dr. Aziz presented a slide show about women in the Middle East, particularly in Iraq. She said even though the Western world viewed the middle eastern women as oppressed, she was stronger.

"In order for the Western woman to feel superior, she must feel sympathy for the Moslem woman and take on her battles," Aziz said. "The Western woman is fighting for her rights surrounding her body. She's putting too much emphasis on that."

Candidate Forum

Editor's note: This is the fourth of a series of editorials written by candidates for the upcoming Student Government Association election March 9 and 10.

Hello students of UMass! Before I explain why I feel I'm the best candidate for the position of Student Government Association president, you should know what the SGA is all about.

David
NUÑEZ

The SGA is the governing body for UMass undergraduates. All undergraduate students who pay their student activity fee are part of the SGA. The two primary goals of the SGA are advocating student rights and handling the Student Activity Trust Fund. Every student contributes to the over $2 million SATF.

The Student Senate is the part of the SGA where policy decisions are made by senators elected from each area. They vote on the distribution of the SATF to various student organizations. This is your money, and you deserve to have it distributed fairly.

There are many things the SGA does and could do with the right leadership. There is a two-fold problem, however. First and foremost, not enough students are involved. The SGA needs new blood, new ideas and more student activism. The SGA needs to be reminded about who they work for — students like you.

The second part of the problem is the SGA also needs new leadership. leadership committed to making UMass worth every penny it costs. Leadership that is willing to bring a renewed sense of dignity and responsibility to the SGA. I believe I can provide that kind of leadership.

I can provide leadership that will help to unify this campus. The SGA needs students who represent the whole campus. Different groups need to work together in order to learn from each other. The SGA and its leadership needs to facilitate this process. No group can be left out.

As a unified campus we can deal with some of the issues. First, informing each and every student about the SGA: what it does and how you can become a part of it. If elected I would work in conjunction with the Public Relations Committee to help publicize the SGA. Using campus media and mass mailings, we can let students decide if they want to get involved. We need to reach every student, regardless of social, economic or ethnic background. Black or White, rich or poor, gay or straight, in state or out, a student is a student.

Second, we need an administration more responsive to student needs and wants. We pay their salaries and deserve their respect. There are some in Whitmore who feel otherwise. We must raise our voices and make them listen to our concerns. We deserve respect; we've paid for it.

Finally, services like Health Services need reform. There is a committee doing that right now. We must find out what is wrong, and that requires a leader willing to listen to you. We need to watch this review process and tell them what is wrong and what needs to be corrected.

We need student leaders willing to fight for student rights. I have the courage and skills to deal with these issues. I'm not rich, I'm not fancy, I'm just another college student like you who wants to see a new UMass. I hope you make the right decision and vote for me to serve as your new SGA president.

David Nuñez is an undergraduate candidate for the office of SGA president.

Smoking is not fashionable

The other morning in the Campus Center I was privy to a conversation between a group of female undergrads whining about the impending crackdown on smokers' rights here at the University. Each woman believed that aside from the controversy surrounding the effects of second-hand smoke, smoking only harms the individual involved, and like Kevorkian's mystical suicide busy box, it should be a matter of personal choice free from the meddling of the valley's P.C. storm troopers. One woman defended her habit, saying, "Since I'm going to die someday anyway, I want to go out in style. I want to go out with a choice." Obviously, she didn't own the copyright to her ignorance, because her friends cheered in unanimous agreement.

Lori
O'CONNOR

I'm balanced precariously upon the smoker's rights fence. I question the ethics of cutting short Joe Camel's public reign of carcinogenic mayhem, but I also wonder about how wise it is to let him continue on unfettered by some sort of restrictions. It shames me to admit it, but I know what it is to crave nicotine, and I know what it is to long for a butt so intensely that you'd just about trade your BayBank card to get one. But never once did I consider smoking a merit badge of style, and I fought to conceal my manic puffing from anyone that I wanted to impress.

I don't think that I felt this way merely because of the hype surrounding the health risks of smoking. I think that it had a lot to do with a string of disjointed memories from my childhood, memories that, in retrospect, I wish I had shared with those petulant darlings reclining on the campus center couches. Not to preach to them, not to scare them, but to make them pause briefly, Marlboros in mid air, and think.

I remember taking walks with my grandfather and rushing home ahead of him to press the autumn leaves that we had found. I was always ahead of him. His chronic emphysema made it difficult for him to do much more than putter along slowly. I remember listening to the big band music that he loved, and him telling me to dance for the both of us because he couldn't join me. I would do a wild and breathless dance for him while he watched from the prison of his own body.

I remember him holding me and telling me stories about the famous people that he had met as a Boston cabbie in the 1940s. I remember his humiliation at having to push me aside every few moments to cough up phlegm into a handkerchief that he reserved especially for that purpose. I remember laying awake at night and listening to the sound of his wheezing reverberate through the house. He slept sitting up because the fluid in his lungs would drown him should he lie down. I remember how proud he was that he quit smoking because he wanted to watch me grow. At only 8 years old, I knew that it was already too late.

I remember the white spittle that ran down his chin the morning that he died, the way that he knew it was over when he grabbed my hands as I pounded on his chest and said, "I'm sorry, be good, goodbye." He died with an orange mashed to a pulp in his hand because he crushed it in mindless fear as he suffocated. He died in a puddle of his own phlegm as the tears of a child who loved him soaked his face. He died with the knowledge that a lifetime of beauty could have been his had he only done one thing differently.

To set the record straight, my grandfather went out in pain, he went out in shame, and he went out in terror. He did not go out in style, and he did not, by any means, have a choice.

Suffering from the Mullins blues

Fifty million is hardly a drop in the bucket. While I cannot picture that much money, I can pick up my fees bill and see the new addition, which amounts to more per year than I spend on books. All I get from the Mullins Center are headaches. From basketball tickets, to special events, I see little good from the construction of the monstrosity.

First, getting tickets to the basketball games is still as hard as ever. If you want them, you have to be willing to stand out in the cold for upwards of an hour before your first class. If you wait longer than that or show after 10 a.m., don't expect to get a ticket.

Secondly, when there is an event, students seem to be the last to know. It's true that I didn't care to see Metallica, but some of my friends did. They found out about it after it was sold out. For the $153 fee, I would think that some decent tickets would be set aside for student purchases. At the least, they could put an ad in the Collegian prior to going public with ticket information.

I understand that Mullins is a "great" attribute to this campus. My friends have been lucky enough to get tickets and claimed it magnificent. I have to question, however, how great this building is when I sit in my classes with paint peeling off the walls, shivering in my seat because the school lacks the budget to operate effectively. I can honestly say I would pay a fee to keep the library funded, but have serious doubts as to the validity of the Mullins Center's fees, which I will pay until I graduate.

Columnist doesn't make point clear

Stephanie Eisenberg's column [Collegian, March 2] offers no positive quality except to provoke a response. The thematic re-emergence of Arsenio Hall's "things that make you go hmmm" only adds to the banality of this pathetic excuse for an article.

Throughout the length of her column, Eisenberg tells us of the many instances in her daily grind in which she finds herself confronted with "harassment, discrimination and degradation," by many of the men which she encounters, including one of her friends. Does she tell her friend what she thinks about his attitude when he tells her to make suggestions to the guy behind the movie counter? No, she tells me. What do I care? I didn't tell her to make suggestions to some movie guy. Why didn't she tell him what she thought?

In addition to the constant drilling of annoying generalizations like all the "girls" in her sexuality class take notes and listen (what are they robots?) while all the "guys" make comments about girls and sex, Eisenberg also decides to make insults that make no sense whatsoever. To call some fast food employee "too gross to touch our food" only because he was looking at her friend implies to me that Eisenberg needed another insult and a few more lines to make her day sound a little more interesting. It didn't work, I'm still uninterested in the point of her essay, and I'm that much more unsympathetic of her situation.

The thing that kills me is I agree with her that there is a constant presence of harassment and discrimination in our society, but thank you! I already knew that Miss Eisenberg. Your negative male generalizations and lack of point makes me think more about whether to educate or belittle you rather than think about the subject at hand.

Notes from the Campus Center Basement

Smoking ban alert! Take to the streets! Burn Whit. . . er, tabacco! A candlelight vigil wouldn't be such a bad idea either, lots of open flames for convenient lights.

Meanwhile, on a more relaxing note, Cannibus Reform is on the march and looking for people to joint. . . er, join. Mary Jane has got all sorts of uses beyond the medicinal and recreational. I've heard you can make rope out of it, paper too. Imagine the price of textbooks made out of weed. They wouldn't be just for rolling paper anymore.

Can you image this pot legalization referendum passing? Well then, take this and try imagining it again.

Interesting and ironic fact of the week: At least statistically, golf yields more injuries than skydiving. Beyond those who venture out to putt with metal clubs during thunderstorms, I think people who golf are just more prone to injury than those who enjoy jumping out of planes. 'Course I'm sure the injuries in skydiving are just a tad more severe.

The most powerful joke on campus maybe.

So would monster trucks shake the Mullins Arena to its foundations? We'll just be sure to ask Guns 'N Roses to play softly to avoid any nasty, injurious, and more importantly, embarrassing incidents. What ever happened to that attorney general investigation about cutting corners anyway? Ninety five dollar fee next year. Enjoy.

Marc
ELLIOTT

A friend of mine once failed Intro to Ethics. Hmmm.

I was watching the news when some idiot detonated a bomb under the World Trade Center. They said a bomb had gone off and word on the street was that it was part of a terrorist attack. No, I'm sure it was an accidental bombing.

Meanwhile in Texas the government gets into a gun fight with a religious cult with a leader that believes he's Christ. Yep, that's America. Man, you can't make this stuff up.

Elvis, Satan and Dogboy. Great movie idea or just juxtaposition madness?

Revenge of the "little yellow spiders." Do they exist or are they just a symbol of UMass students' worst fears?

The United States is finally going to have to pay off its credit card bills as the Clinton administration kicks into gear. These taxes are just making up for all those years of decadent over-spending in the Reagan/Bush era, grin and bear it, your children will.

"March 4 is the only day that actually tells you to do something." If anybody gets this joke please explain.

Rage in the Cage. Mullins Madness. It just doesn't have the same ring to it. Let's try "you pay, we play." Better than the Cal Zone. I'm reaching now.

[Expletive]. No joke or punchline here. I just wanted to get the word [expletive] into the paper.

Nice that we're finally getting a constitution for the student government. Only a couple decades late.

Why are crewcuts so popular? I figure I'll just be patient and nature will eventually make me bald.

Eh.

Open gays have to hide in the closet in fear of homophobia

As an "out" gay man, I generally do not make any attempt to "act straight."

"Out" refers to being "out of the closet," meaning that most people who know me know that I am gay. Since most people assume someone is straight unless he or she is "blatant," I have pierced both of my ears, often wear ACT-UP, Queer Nation, and other T-shirts and my favorite button reads "better gay than grumpy."

My family knows I am gay. I told my mother and two sisters soon after high school. I got the courage to tell my father after almost dying in a car accident.

In my accident, I broke some ribs, punctured my lungs, and damaged nerves in my left arm and leg. But, most importantly, I bashed my head really hard. I was in a coma for seven days.

There is a coma scale from one to thirteen. Anyone not in a coma is a fourteen. If you are a one or a two, you are never coming out of your coma. I was a six for a number of days.

After I got out of my coma, I was in a more-or-less comatose state for around six weeks, slowly growing more alert. I did not start to speak for about four or five weeks, and then only haltingly, often stopping to search for words. My mind was a complete blank. I would learn something and forget it a minute later. I did not recognize my family and friends who came to see me.

I have what is known as a "head injury," although "brain injury" is more accurate. Your brain, like any other part of your body, will get bruised if it is knocked around too much. My doctors had a metal bolt stuck in my forehead to measure my brain's pressure. No one really knew if I would live or die.

John
BECK

Thankfully, most of my mind and my nerves have regenerated in the past few years. However, I still do not remember years of my life. I probably never will.

I am telling you all of this to say that at no time in my head-injured experience was I not gay. It is not something I could forget. As my mind began to regenerate, the fact that I am gay was there from the start, even before I relearned my name. It is a part of who I am.

This gave me the courage and confidence to tell my father that his only son is gay. Furthermore, it has made me a strong supporter of gay, lesbian and bisexual civil rights.

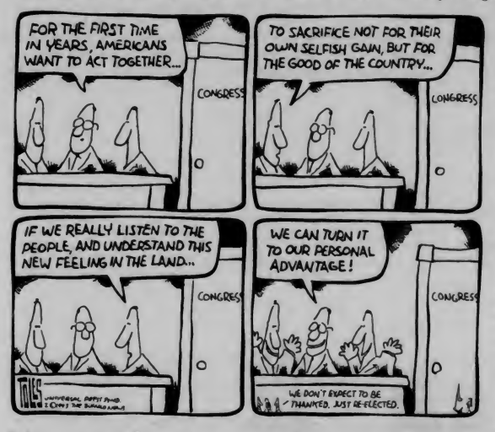
I know now that people don't choose to be gay, any more than someone chooses to be a man or a woman. It wasn't because we had a strange uncle who messed with us when we were three, or had a bad experience with the opposite sex in kindergarten.

It frustrates me that I'll have to "hide in the closet" to get a particular job, apartment or adopt children. I'll have to be careful when I leave the shelter of UMass and talk to a bank person about a mortgage or car loan. I'll even have to watch myself around the people who collect the garbage, so they don't take out their homophobia on me by dumping my trash on the front lawn.

Don't think these things don't happen. I used to think things like that happened "only in Colorado," but I have been surprised more than once here in liberal, progressive, earthy-crunchy Amherst.

Though it's not exactly the same thing, I think I understand some of what Black people must have felt when they had to sit in the back of buses. It robbed them of their humanity. It robs me of mine.

John Beck is a UMass student.



Message from an exchange student 'don't take Amherst for granted'

I am a UMass student who has been studying on exchange in Denmark since August. Denmark is a small country in northern Europe with a population of 5 million people and 10 million pigs. It is a land of houses with red tile roofs and of Carlsberg beer, where jaywalking is a crime rarely committed and cyclists enjoy their own lane on many roads.

Even though Denmark is a wonderful place I'm not here to talk to you about Denmark. I'm writing because not only do I miss my family, my friends and my boyfriend, I miss UMass. Despite all the criticism it receives, including some of my own, UMass has much to offer anyone who spends the time to simply notice all that is happening there.

There are many things that I took for granted, like movies playing on campus that are only a couple of dollars and are always in English; intramural soccer; and basketball games at the Cage (but I guess now we all miss them).

I miss Blue Wall brownies, Antonio's pizza; the opportunity to take classes like scuba diving, social dance or fencing, and even get credit for taking them; and I miss not having to pay 24 Kroner or $4 for a beer.

I miss Amherst's weather because even though it's rainy and cold one day, it might just be warm and sunny the next day. I miss the mountains that surround the Happy Valley, not to mention Puffer's Pond and the Quabbin Reservoir.

I miss Jim's Journal and those who also find it amusing and I sometimes miss the editorials because through them I learn about myself, which usually means the realizations that I am not as liberal as I had previously thought.

I miss the things about UMass that you just can't figure out. Why was Morrill built like a maze? Why if you're not studying engineering do you have classes all the way at the Grad Tower? And how does anyone get him/herself to class in the late Spring Semester when students everywhere are playing frisbee, listening to music, playing basketbell or working on that base tan for summer?

I miss the Tower Library, dining commons food, fire alarms, E lot, and classes at 8 a.m. (because they never do get your schedule quite right at Whitmore).

O.K. so maybe I don't miss everything. Have fun and don't forget to feed the ducks.

As college students, many of us feel close to immortal. After all, this is the prime of our lives, the best time of our lives. Death is one of the furthest things from our minds. However, it shouldn't be — because it can happen suddenly at any time.

Luke
ERICKSON

On Monday night, I got a phone call from my best friend in my hometown. The mother of one of our friends had just died. She was only 50 years old.

Our friend's name is Ed. I graduated from high school with him in 1989 and I've gone to UMass with him until this year, when Ed went to Spain on exchange. I've been writing to Ed all through the school year, keeping him abreast of all the happenings at UMass.

Now we will reunite under the worst of circumstances — the wake and the funeral. As far as I can tell, this is just as big a shock to Ed as it is to me. He hadn't mentioned anything about his mother being ill in any of his letters, and we're fairly close.

I have two elderly parents. My mother will turn 69 in August, and my Dad will turn 68 at the end of this month. It's tough for me to write, but I know in my heart that I will probably lose one of my parents before I'm 30 years old.

Hearing this bad news only makes that realization about my parents more painfully obvious to me. There's really nothing I can say to Ed when I see him next to make him feel any better. I can only be there for him as a friend.

I learned this two years ago when another friend lost him mother. "Sarge," as everyone called him, is a 6-foot, 230-pound teddy-bear-with-a-beard; but when his mother passed away, he was a full-grown man sobbing like a lost little boy. It's one of the saddest sights I've ever seen, one that I'll never forget.

I've heard so many people complain about their parents being overbearing whenever they're home. I'd just like to tell these people to stop and think about what their parents have done for them to get them into college. Chances are, without their parents' help, they wouldn't be here right now.

Nonetheless, I feel very lucky that I have a good relationship with my parents, even though as the youngest of their nine children (my parents had three by conventional methods, then adopted six more) they have the apron strings tied like a noose sometimes.

My only hope is that students reading this column will take some time today to think about their parents, grandparents and other loved ones and remember how fragile life can be.

A day in the life of a college man

2 p.m. My alarm rings, well not my clock, my bladder. I shouldn't have drunk that case of beer last night. My roommate gets a quick laugh at my disheveled appearance. I warn him that if he laughs again Martina Narvratalova will marry him. He stops laughing. Now that I'm out of bed I really regret drinking the night before. But, I'm a man, that's my job. I realized I have missed my first class. Damn! I might have denied myself an opportunity to "make disparaging comments about girls and sex".

2 p.m. I leave for my 2:30, making sure I have enough time to verbally assault every gal I pass on the way to class. Before I leave, however, I check my mailbox to see if my first issue of Swank magazine has arrived. It hasn't. Oh well, I'll have to wait another day for every guy's favorite pastime, pornography.

4 p.m. Exit the large auditorium, where I successfully made every guy proud by drawing naked women on my desk, accompanied by various captions even Swank would be proud of. My manhood is intact.

5 p.m. Go up town to get some dinner. I lose my appetite when our waitress politely says, "all men should be castrated because they leave lousy tips," all this coming from a young women whose ears would fall off if it wasn't for her 65 earrings. Her nose ring falls in my lap so my friends and I run away.

6 p.m. Nap. It's been a long day. It isn't easy being a man.

7 p.m. Wake up in time to see Three's Company. Oh my favorite episode! My hero Jack Tripper (he lives with two chicks!) gets sexually harassed at his new job. Poor guy.

7:30 p.m. Increase the thinking capacity of my brain by catching an episode of Divorce Court. Oh what do you know, It's Zoe Baird. I wonder who is cleaning her house.

7 a.m. Wake up. Thank God, it was just a nightmare! I have to stop reading that damn Collegian before I go to bed.

I was intrigued by Ms. Eisenbergs' editorial [Collegian March 2] concerning her average, ordinary day. I question her effort in trying to change things. Why would an educated college woman be friends with a guy who cheers on a rape scene like I cheer on the Bruins.

I wholeheartedly agree that sexual harassment is a serious issue, however, male bashing is not the correct channel through which to remedy the situation. In spite of this, you are obviously in touch with what's popular on this holy campus. You have made it into the editorial hall of shame with your utterly bogus generalizations.

Wood loathe to leave helm of student gov't

By MARK PRESTON
Collegian Staff

She is the advocate and spokesperson for the undergraduate student body at the University of Massachusetts.

This time last year she was both excited and optimistic about her new duties and responsibilities. One year later it is coming to an end.

Jennifer Wood will leave her office once the new Student Government Association president is elected, but more importantly she will graduate and leave the school which has given her so much.

"I will be sad to leave UMass and no longer be able to be the president of the SGA," Wood said.

Many of you may not know her by face because she has spent most of her time either in Boston or in her office on the top floor of the Student Union. She fights for student rights at the largest state university in New England whose student government is virtually powerless because it has no constitution.

Wood said she is pleased with the overall direction the SGA took under her leadership.

"I think we have accomplished a lot because people came together and worked together on issues affecting students," she said.

The three issues which she thinks the student government was particularly effective in the past year were: the establishment of the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy; creating a climate where students feel more comfortable and involved in student government; and town-university issues which she is still working on.

She said she has only three major regrets about the last year: the state's passage of a policy of tuition retention; inability to perpetuate strong student leadership; failure to clarify the role of student government to the students of UMass through books and pamphlets.

She hopes the new student government president will be an effective spokesperson and advocate for the student body.

"Be very open to learning and never believe that you know everything," is her advice to the next president.

"There are not any real concrete guidelines for the SGA president to follow thus allowing them many options when addressing issues of concern to students," said Wood.

She concluded, "I hope the SGA will set a tone on how to act on issues concerning students and be open to their concerns."

"I was battered for eight years while my community and government did nothing. The police were afraid to take my husband's gun away, even after he held it to my daughter and my head. They were afraid because he worked for the federal government," Rock said.

Rock says she began receiving $579 and some food stamps for her family of three, after she left her husband. "That money is $150 short of what my rent costs. We were left without breakfast and dinner and had to burn chairs to get some heat," said Rock.

"It hurts to hear my son, who was made to eat his own vomit, and daughter, who had a gun held to her head, say, 'let's go back home mom.' It was an emotional and physical strain on the family," she said.

"My son began taking drugs. For him it was a lot easier to get stoned than to face reality. I blame the government and the institutions. This country does not value children especially children of color and single mothers. It's easy to see that the government has a hatred for women when they give twice as much money and aid to a foster child than a welfare child," said Rock.

"My son says the system is a monster and I want you to prove him wrong," said Rock.

The women all expressed their hopes for society to rethink and challenge the government and its economic structures.

"Organizations that are progressive bring together great population," said Davis, "We must imagine ourselves as part of the global struggle, because isn't it all about finding ways to be happy while everyone else is happy?"

out the caller wanted to know about his wearing coneheads at UMass basketball games.

Newnan is and will always be a conehead.

Newnan sits on the Board of Trustees, the executive board which sets policy for the five-campus University of Massachusetts system. Each university in the system, which includes Dartmouth, Worcester, Lowell, Boston and the flagship campus at Amherst, is allotted one seat for a student representative to sit and help shape policies which impact on students.

"Whoever my successor might be, he needs to establish a good working relationship with the incoming chancellor, president and his fellow board members," Newnan said.

Newnan said he will carry only on one major regret out the door with him this spring.

"Despite the fact the rebuilding of [the Student Government Association] has gone amazingly well over the last two years, more student outreach is needed," Newnan said.

Three things top his list as major accomplishments that occurred while he was in office: recognition of his election two years ago after he helped halt an administration-sponsored reform of student government; restoration of the Student Senate as a viable entity and a representative governance body; and the removal and replacement of administrative personnel he saw as hostile to student empowerment.

Newnan refused to identify the former administrators he referred to.

Weld proposes stricter drunk driving laws

By ROBERT W. TROTT
Associated Press

BOSTON — Gov. William Weld unveiled a measure Wednesday that would make it illegal to operate a motor vehicle with a blood-alcohol concentration level of .08, down from .10.

The head of a defense lawyers' organization said the Republican governor's move was geared more toward generating tough on crime publicity than fighting drunk driving.

Weld's proposal would be a separate offender from the current .10 blood-alcohol limit for operating under the influence. The lower blood-alcohol would spare prosecutors from having to prove the driver was impaired.

"Convictions of OUI (operating under the influence) are often difficult to obtain even where the concentration significantly exceeds .10," Weld and Lt. Gov. Paul Cellucci said in a letter to lawmakers.

"One reason for this difficulty is the extreme degree of subjectivity involved in determining if a driver is actually 'under the influence.' A .08 per se offense provides an objective standard which could substantially improve the Commonwealth's ability to remove drunk drivers from the road," Weld and Cellucci said.

Penalties for driving with a blood-alcohol level of .08 would be identical to those that apply to operating under the influence; offenders would be able to seek treatment for first and second offenses.

"From a defense point of view, the question is, why?" said Thomas Hoopes, co-founder of the Massachusetts Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers. "When it was first established at that level (.10), it was based in reliable opinions by scientific experts."

"It strikes me that he's trying to grab a little bit of headline here," Hoopes said of Weld. Both Hoopes and Weld are former prosecutors.

Weld, who formally announced his legislation at the Lowell Police Department, said 28 states have a per-se limit of .10 or lower

Other provisions in the legislation would:

- Increase maximum sentences and fines for first time OUI offenses, from 2 years and $1,000 to 2 and 1/2 years and $10,000. Treatment programs programs still would be available, at a judges's discretion, for first and second time offenders.
- Increase maximum sentences for second and subsequent offenses. Fifth time offenders would be slapped with a mandatory 5-year prison term. Multiple offenders also would lose their licenses.
- Identify repeat offenders with license plate stickers.
- Provide mandatory license suspension of three months for anyone under age 21 who buys or attempts to buy alcohol.

Parents bash state over school

By JON MARCUS
Associated Press

BOSTON — Parents of mentally retarded children whose care is paid for by the state confronted officials Tuesday over plans to cancel a public contract with a private residential school.

Gov. William F. Weld last week ordered an end to an $8 million-a-year state contract with the Crystal Springs School in Assonet, which officials charged with spending taxpayer money on luxury cars, a petting zoo and vacation homes.

But 50 angry parents who descended on the Statehouse Tuesday said the care their children were receiving at the school outweighed other considerations.

"They're not a dollar sign," Diane Hoffman shouted at outnumbered state officials who met with the protesters. "They're human beings."

Hoffman, whose 23-year-old son Craig lives at Crystal Springs, turned to her fellow parents and said: "Let's bring all our children to their houses and let them take care of them."

State officials agreed to make a visit to the school and to temporarily stop contacting parents about moving their children elsewhere.

"We're not going to move a child, a single child, until there's an alternative in place," said Joe Landolfi, spokesman for the Executive Office of Health and Human Services after emerging from the angry crowd.

"The needs of the patients come first, so we will make sure that people are not left high and dry down there," Weld told reporters later.

But Landolf said the Crystal Springs School was poorly managed and expensive.

"The fiscal status of the program has been more than

Fazzi said she discovered a lot about students' concerns while petitioning for her nomination.

"A BayBank machine in Hampden Commons, better washers and driers, improvements in the Escort Service and cleaner dorms. These may seem like small things, but that's what the students really want," said Fazzi.

"I want to be approachable to students," Fazzi said. "Students should be able to come up and say, 'Jen, I want this changed.'"

Fazzi said changing the student senators' roles would help.

"I'd like to see a little more enthusiasm," Fazzi said. "I'd like to see senators getting more feedback from their constituents."

Fazzi said she is against tuition and fee increases and would oppose any in the future.

"Why are these fees needed? Are they really bettering our education?," said Fazzi. "There must be something we can do to alleviate the costs."

Fazzi is junior political science and economics major. She is a member of Phi Sigma Alpha, a political science honor society.

She was a student government senator and member of the Senate Finance Committee last semester. Fazzi was also a member of the Board of Governors member last fall and was once the vice president of the Republican Club.

Fazzi worked for the Democratic National Committee in 1988 and 1992. She attended both the Democratic and Republican National Conventions in each year.

Fazzi said she would favor more student involvement with University administration.

"If students could feel they're more a part of the administration, they would be more comfortable," Fazzi said. "Right now it's so hard to know where to turn to with problems."

Fazzi said she opposes the University's Legal Services Office regaining its right to represent students in court.

"I think it would create more trouble than it's worth," Fazzi said. "There are a lot of radical movements here. I'm afraid people would be crying left and right and trying to sue the University."

Fazzi said she supports the Senate's efforts to ratify the student government constitution.

has to be aware of that and believe in it."

Turco cited past problems in the Students Activities Office claiming it has been hostile toward students, failed to abide by its administrative capacities and employs too many staff members whose salaries are drawn from the Student Activities Trust Fund.

Turco is a senior history major and political science minor. He first joined the Student Senate in the fall of 1989, when he represented Brown residence hall. He also served as interim senate speaker and Patterson senator. Turco is currently a senator representing the Greek area.

He is president of Alpha Chi Rho fraternity and Interfraternity Council President.

Turco worked as an intern for state Rep. William G. Reinstein in the summer of 1987 and as a page for Sergeant-In-Arms Charles McGowan the two following summers.

Turco said his involvement in state politics would be an asset to the student trustee position.

"My experience in working on the legislative level in the state and an administrative level on campus gives me the credentials to be an effective trustee," Turco said.

"It's not just about the campus level. In dealing with issues like tuition increases or Legal Services' litigation rights, the trustee must have knowledge of the state house and be trusted by the representatives," he said.

Turco said he supports the University's Legal Services in regaining their right to represent students in court.

Turco said he is happy with the new direction student communication with administration is taking.

Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Tom Robinson and Ashoke Ganguli, director of Auxiliary Services, "have done a fantastic job in dealing with students," Turco said. "These discussions of students concerns with administrators should continue."

shaky," he said.

Many of those charges also were reported last month by the Boston Herald in a series about private state contracts with Integrated Service Associates of Norton and Habilitation Assistsnce Corp. of Plymouth.

"The school was judged, tried and sentenced, all in the Boston Herald," said Edmund Silva of Sommerset, whose 21-year-old daughter Melissa lives at Crystal Springs. "They're asking our children to pay the sentence."

But Weld responded Tuesday that his administration took action only where it had independent evidence against the contractors.

The school's owner, Charles Young, said Tuesday that he also planned to fight the governor's decision.

He said Crystal Springs appears more expensive than comparable programs because its fees include additional services at no extra charges.

"If (the Department of Mental Retardation) saves $10,000 by not placing a patient here, but transportation and nursing (in another program) ultimately costs the commonwealth more than $10,000, how are they saving money?" he asked.

Many of the parents wore Crystal Springs T-shirts and a delegation that the contract be continued.

They have hired an attorney, Henry Clark, who said the parents also have considered legal action.

"This cannot be dealt with the way it has been done to date," he said.

Clark called the programs "old news" that were corrected by a June 1991 agreement with state.

"There's nothing more important to anybody here than our children, and we will stop at nothing to protect them," said another parent, Leonard Cole.

Displaced team: for the umpteenth time in as many years, drum roll please: Michigan. Disgraced team: UCLA, Houston, Arizona

Hard to pick the hottest team in the country an early round loser in the NCAA, but being at the Providence Civic Center, and seeing Trent Forbes rain threes as Arizona sat idly by affects my decision. Idaho, here you come!

As for Utah, you're asking how a top 15 team can be a sleeper. Well, no one respects the Utes, though Rick Majerus is a master.

Southeast

Who's hot: Vanderbilt (scorching), New Orleans, Florida State, Western Kentucky, Memphis State
Who's not: Duke, Tulane, Kentucky
Who's a sleeper: W. Kentucky, Jackson State
Displaced teams: Okla St.. Disgraced team: Louisville.

Yeah, yeah, you'll try to say that Denny Crum's squad is different this year, whereas the scoreboard will read the same: W. Kentucky 101, Louisville 89. As for Vandy, UNO and the rest of the pack, this bracket is one of the hottest. The SEC and ACC reside here, and with Memphis St. and the two New Orleans schools (Tulane and UNO), this will be an exciting venue.

Midwest

Who's hot: Indiana, Iowa, Marquette
Who's not: Kansas, Purdue, Oklahoma
Who's a sleeper: Cleveland State, Coppin State
Displaced team: W. Forest. Disgraced team: Iowa State

Indiana has been hot since conference play, as has Marquette. Purdue and Oklahoma are two teams which are slipping and will find trouble making the Sweet 16. The selection committee thinks W. Forest is out in Michigan somewhere and put the Demon Deacons there. Final Four: North Carolina, Utah, Vanderbilt, Indiana. Finals: UNC-Indiana. NCAA Champion: Indiana (sticking with my preseason pick.)

it," said assistant coach James "Bruiser" Flint.

Pace's basketball career is only half the story, however. A Sport Management major graduating in May, he has gone on with his life, becoming actively involved in the Black Student Union with Robinson. He is the BSU's treasurer.

Pace has also been a part of the Bridging Worlds program, which allows UMass students the chance to speak as role models at urban high schools in the area. In essence, to give a little something back.

Pace went home to Colorado over winter break and heard the Manual High team was in a slump. Pace talked to the team as the players, many of whom grew up watching and hearing about him, sat quiet and listened.

"Tommy's one of the nicest kids we've ever had, since I've been here, and I think Tommy will be real successful once he leaves college," said Flint.

"Since we came here, Tommy's been my ace, we've been together from the beginning," said Robinson. "It's unfortunate that his knees weren't working for him, but he's learned the same thing I learned, to refocus himself on academics. I think he's taken advantage of all aspects."

"All-around, he's just a nice guy, well respected by his peers," said Pearlmutter. "He's always stressed education, and he's real quiet. He's never been a tattletale or anything like that.

"He's just a winner."

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Any financial shock waves will subside quickly, thanks to your calm, clear analysis of the situation. Good times with friends are indicated. A letter brings welcome family news.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Explanations may be futile today, serving only to widen the gulf between you and a family member. This is one of those times when it is best to wait things out.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): You know which strings to pull behind the scenes to get what you want job-wise. Start phoning people as early as possible today. Although your charm is an asset, avoid over doing it.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Wining and dining the right people can be very profitable now. Just curb your drinking. A secret business meeting will go better than you dreamed possible.

LEO (July 23-Aug.22): Be especially watchful and composed now. A project could suddenly get derailed. Your poise under pressure will set things right again.

VIRGO (Aug.23-Sept.22): Valuable insights are exchanged in closed door meetings. Sharing your experiences with close friends helps them understand your motives. .

LIBRA (SEPT.23-Oct.22): A wonderful day for travel. A business trip could be part of the picture. Correspondence is more important than ever. Keep track of valuable contacts.

SCORPIO (Oct.23-Nov. 21): Keep your temper in check and you will win big! Explore new opportunities, even if it means sticking your neck out. Jot down original ideas - they will come in handy in the near future.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Curb a tendency to answer questions in a superior manner. Profit from someone else's experience and show more humility. Romance takes a serious turn. Be honest.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 21-Jan. 19): Influential people are impressed by your quiet thinking today. Look beyond the surface when making up your mind about people. Be magnanimous.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): A big chance at work may start you thinking about seeking employment elsewhere. Hang in there for a little while longer. Keep quiet about your financial affairs.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Keep an eye on spending! Although pinching pennies is not the entire answer to beating inflation, it helps. Check an agreement before signing.

of life into the program. Four (count 'em, four) freshmen usually hear their names rattled off when the starting lineups are announced.

Melissa Gurile has been the biggest surprise of the freshman class. Gurile, a 6-3 center, was only 6-1 when O'Brien and recruiting coordinator/assistant coach Jill Rooney recruited her for UMass.

Two inches and nearly a full year under her belt later, Gurile has shown unlimited potential due to her all-around skills. The only thing Gurile needs for her future is a little more strength; she already has all of the needed skills on the court.

Then there is frosh forward Octavia Thomas, probably the most highly rated of this year's class. Thomas, out of Newark, New Jersey, is as shy as she is athletic. Which is to say, she doesn't like to talk much. Instead, Thomas lets her play do her talking and believe me, she comes in loud and clear.

The point guard and maestro of the club is freshman Tricia Hopson. Hopson does not believe in taking things slow; anyone who has watched her drive the length of the court would agree with me on that one.

Kim Gregory, a freshman shooting guard, looks as though she could be the emotional leader of this merry bunch. Gregory is affable and talkative off the court and a gritty player on the court.

In a big game against George Washington earlier in the year, Gregory showed her flair for the dramatics as she banked in an improbable, turnaround three as the shot clock expired during a crucial possession.

O'Brien and Rooney continued to show off their recruiting prowess this year. UMass has inked four highly regarded recruits for next season. Building blocks are one thing a coach can never get enough of. O'Brien and Co. apparently want to build a skyscraper.

A schedule with tough games against nationally known programs is a must if one is to build up a team's respectability. Earlier this year O'Brien and the Minutewomen welcomed No. 4 Ohio State to the Curry Hicks Cage. Next year No. 3 Vanderbilt will be making an appearance at the Mullins Center. Talk about tough.

For the upperclassmen this season represents a sudden reversal of fortune. Senior forward Kim Kristofik who was one of the lone bright lights last season now finds herself amongst a room full of spotlights.

The crowds at the Curry Hicks Cage and Mullins Center should pick up now that the Minutewomen have turned the corner. If they don't it is a shame, plain and simple.

The biggest difference between then and now? Perhaps senior forward/guard Gloria Nevarez summed it up best when she quipped, "This is fun now."

Senior Night closes out regular season

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

JOSH REYNOLDS / COLLEGIAN
Senior Harper Williams and the rest of the Minutemen look to continue their scrappy winning ways tonight as they host St. Joseph's in the final regular season game, on Senior Night.

Four seniors will say farewell tonight when the University of Massachusetts basketball team (19-6) finishes its regular season versus St. Joseph's University (17-8) at 7 p.m. at the William D. Mullins Memorial Center.

Three of the seniors, Tony Barbee, Harper Williams and Kennard Robinson, will close their careers on a high note, but for the fourth, Senior Night will be a bittersweet experience.

Tommy Pace made up "Calipari's quartet," the fourth promising player in head coach John Calipari's second recruiting class. Fans who do not remember the Minutemen in the National Invitational Tournament are even less likely to know who Pace is, or was, or could have been.

"Senior Night will be kind of tough," said Pace. "It's hard enough to just go to the games, but the discipline I've learned in sport helps me deal with it.

"It's gonna be good because we all came in together and we'll leave together, but's it's sort of sad for me."

Pace was a phenom from Colorado, a player who had a bright future before chronic knee ailments stopped him.

"If it wasn't for his injury, Tommy would've been the best big man to ever come from Colorado, even at 6-foot-5," said Manual (Colo.) High School assistant coach Mark Pearlmutter. "He was a heckuva high school player, an all-around nice guy."

Pace was a Colorado Gatorade Circle of Champions Player of the Year out of Manual High in Denver, a 6-foot-5 power forward who was on a 23-2 state championship team his sophomore year.

His junior year of high school was when Pace first had problems, only playing the last 10 games of the season when he blew his knee out. After earning a letter in cross country rehabilitating his knees, Pace finished his high school career in grand fashion, being named first team All-State. Still, Pace said he knew it was a matter of time.

"After high school, my play went down a lot," said Pace. "Had I not been injured, I know I would've been some sort of impact player."

Pace played 30 games his freshman year, contributing off the bench and logging more than 10 minutes a game.

Probably one of the sweeter victories for Pace came in his home state. His freshman year, he returned home for the Colorado holiday tournament, and his four points, six rebounds, one assist and one turnover in 14 minutes helped UMass upset Colorado, a team he grew up watching and a team which did not heavily recruit him.

Since then, good times on the court have been few and far between, as patella tendinitis and multiple knee surgeries hampered him. Pace saw very limited action his sophomore season, even less as a junior, and finally decided after last year to give up his career for good.

"My freshman year I had a decent season, but I always thought 'when would it end,'" he said. "It's just been frustrating. I had some problems over the summer, my mobility, it just isn't what I'd like.

"I wanted to push myself; [the decision to not suit up this season] was a tough decision, because I don't like to quit. I just felt like I was taking up a spot on the roster."

"Tommy was one of the hardest working guys on the team, we knew when he said 'I can't play,' he really meant

Men's swim looks to extend streak

Minutemen travel to ECAC Championships in Buffalo

By KEVIN HERLIHY
Collegian Staff

As the thrill of winning its seventh straight New England Championship wears off, the University of Massachusetts men's swimming team, ranked 30th in the country, begins its last meet of the season today as it travels to Buffalo, N.Y. or the ECAC Championship.

It will be somewhat of a strange meet for the 12-1 Minutemen, because for the first time since suffering their only loss of the season — a 169-130 loss to Brown University in the first week of January — they are not the meet favorite. It is a fact that is very important to head coach Russ Yarworth and his swimmers, as he has noticed a big difference in the attitude of going to the New England Championship, as the team everybody wants to beat, and going to ECACs as one team in the crowd.

"We're not familiar with the competition," Yarworth said, "because most of them are out of our region. We're just going with less pressure and not as many expectations. We were a little too tense and nervous at the New England Championships."

That tension and nervousness "was a result of the swimmers not wanting to be 'the team' to lose the [New England] title for the first time," he said. This week the team has been relaxed at practice, and seems ready for the task.

Last year the Minutemen finished a stronger-than-it-seems third in a fine field of schools that put good deals of money into their swimming programs. The defending champion is the host school, State University of New York at Buffalo, and the Bulls, according to Yarworth, are one of the favorites this year as well. Among the other teams expected to contend for the title are Bucknell, Fordham, Pittsburgh and James Madison.

MEET NOTES: It is the last meet of the year for UMass seniors Chris Barrett, Sean Clark, Rich House, Greg Meymaris, Joe Morris, Jay Peluso and Scott Reed, so not only will they and the rest of the team want to post personal best times for the good of the team, everyone will be working hard to qualify for the NCAA Championship. For a UMass swimmer to accomplish such an achievement is unlikely, says Yarworth, because of reasons that involve money instead of talent.

Women's hoop moving on up

0-27 in 1990-91. That was then.

10-14 and counting in 1992-93. This is now.

The numbers above represent the startling improvement of the UMass women's basketball team under coach Joanie O'Brien. It is too bad more people don't know about that improvement. It really has been fun to watch.

Jeff
CROFTS

Back in the old (is it really that old?) days the Minutewomen were outclassed and outgunned every time they stepped on the court. They didn't win a regular season conference game for three years.

Enter O'Brien and crew. Now in the new days UMass can compete with every team that they meet on the court. The Minutewomen have won five games in the A-10 this season. Percentage-wise that is an improvement which cannot be measured. Remember, anything times zero is zero.

O'Brien comes from a winning background. As an assistant for Auburn University, O'Brien's teams had a collective record of 149-20. No, that was not a typo. Now at UMass she is starting to instill some of that winning pride.

The current rise of women's hoop is starting to look remarkably similar to the formative years the men's program had under John Calipari. Both O'Brien and Calipari know what it takes to jump start a floundering sports program.

One big key to building a good college sports team is to recruit, recruit and recruit some more. O'Brien has done and continues to do exactly that.

This year's freshman class has breathed an undeterminable amount

Ski team nears finale

By ANTHONY GUIDO
Collegian correspondent

The season for the University of Massachusetts ski team is winding down with some success. The team competed in the NCAA Eastern Championships this past weekend.

Both the men's and women's team finished in the middle of the pack at ninth, which is a decent showing with the tough field at Middlebury, Vt., according to UMass head coach Bill MacConnell.

MacConnell, at the helm for his 32nd season, was generally pleased with his team's performance and especially so with Bill Schaefer.

"It is unthinkable for Bill Schaefer to finish third in both the slalom and downhill. He has proved to me to be in the top five or six skiers in the NCAA," MacConnell said.

The meet was the last for all team members, except Schaefer who will compete for a week starting Friday at Steamboat Springs, Colo. MacConnell said his chances in the USAA races are slim, for skiers move on to the national U.S. ski team from there.

As for the team's season, MacConnell said, "It was a good strong year for us, having tied for the regional championships a few weeks ago."

Both teams finished in second place overall for the season right behind Boston College. The men's team won two of their 10 meets, with the women finishing second six times.

Current star Schaefer has had an interesting college career. He started at the University of Wyoming and last year was a key component on a team that finished second in the NCAAs. When the sport was dropped, he came to UMass, where his skiing career first began.

Schaefer's father owns Berkshire East, the UMass home slope in Charlemont, Mass. He has skied most of his life there, so is very comfortable for the UMass home meets.

MacConnell is taking Schaefer to the next level at Steamboat Springs, facing the very best racers in the country. According to MacConnell, he feels Schaefer is living a dream right now, facing skiers with Olympic futures.

SAMUEL L. JACKSON

After the 'FEVER'

THE ACCLAIMED STAR OF 'JUNGLE FEVER' SPEAKS OUT ON RACE, ROLE MODELS AND HIS LATEST FILM, 'AMOS & ANDREW'

By JON LUPO / Collegian Staff

NEW YORK – TO WATCH ACTOR SAMUEL L. JACKSON COME INTO VIEW IS LIKE SEEING AN OLD ACQUAINTANCE. IT'S THAT FEELING YOU GET WHEN YOU RECOGNIZE SOMEONE BUT DON'T QUITE RECALL THE NAME. JACKSON IS A SUBTLE CHAMELEON IN THE WORLD OF STAGE AND SCREEN, SLIDING EFFORTLESSLY FROM CHARACTER TO CHARACTER.

Now, as Jackson makes his way into the Columbia Pictures screening room without pretention, he looks very much like a tall Spike Lee, complete with baseball cap. That skill of being someone else, or at least looking like someone else, has made Jackson one of the most sought-after character actors in recent years.

It is probably the look of Gator, Wesley Snipes's crack-addict brother in Spike Lee's acclaimed Jungle Fever, that most people immediately recall. That role won him the first Best Supporting Performance Award ever handed out by the judges at the Cannes Film Festival.

But Jackson is hardly an overnight success. He's been quietly standing out in other Lee productions like Do the Right Thing, School Daze and Mo' Better Blues. He's also made appearances in Martin Scorsese's Goodfellas, Milos Forman's Ragtime, Patriot Games and White Sands. Suddenly, Jackson looks awfully familiar.

He can currently be seen in two leading roles. One is the Danny Glover part in the Lethal Weapon parody National Lampoon's Loaded Weapon 1 and the other is the upcoming Amos & Andrew [see review below], both of which, he is proud to say, he shares top billing with co-stars Emilio Estevez and Nicholas Cage, respectively.

It is Amos & Andrew, though, that has brought him here on this cold Saturday morning with writer/director E. Max Frye to discuss a wide array of issues, from race to role models and, of course, their new film. For Jackson, it is another step to eluding stardom; for Frye, it is his directorial debut.

In Amos & Andrew, Jackson plays Pulitzer Prize-winning playwright Andrew Sterling, whose self proclaimed "angry voice of the people" has enabled him to reap respect and riches. He moves to a fictional Massachusetts island and while unpacking his stereo, his White neighbors assume he is robbing the house and call the police.

The police appear to agree and attempt to capture the "burglar" by shooting first and asking questions later. When the police captain fears losing the upcoming election due to this major foul-up, he hires crook Amos O'Dell (Nicholas Cage) to fake a hostage attempt to cover the captain's tracks. The best laid plans, as movies would have it, fall wildly awry.

Jackson is fairly blunt with reasons why he was attracted to this social comedy of race, stereotypes and mistaken identity.

"I was about to be unemployed," Jackson says. "It was also

FILM REVIEW

Clash of themes sinks 'Amos & Andrew'

By JON LUPO
Collegian Staff

As a mild-mannered film reviewer, I don't ask for much. Relative quiet in the theater, a comfy seat — and no more phone calls from that one guy who's harassing me about why I couldn't have not liked Body of Evidence because Madonna showcd her breasts a lot.

Yet it's movies like the would-be social comedy Amos & Andrew that really get my goat. It's particularly disheartening to screen the film and then meet the star and director and try to work around the fact that their film isn't nearly as good as they're making it out to be.

But it's part of the job, I suppose. Who said reviewing films was easy? Amos & Andrew fails on a myriad of levels; from its striking clash of slapstick and social commentary to its silly, empty ironies and horrid attempts at satire and farce.

Amos & Andrew is an embarrassing misstep for actor Samuel L. Jackson (who was so good in Jungle Fever) and proof positive that writer turned director E. Max Frye (he wrote the charming Something Wild) should rethink that second career.

When one sets out to satirize stereotypes by reveling in them, they better be sure they know what they're doing. Frye doesn't seem to understand how much of a fine line he's treading. False symbolism and broad stereotypes aren't enough. Good intentions or not, Amos & Andrew becomes knee-deep stuck in the very themes it's trying to exploit.

In Amos & Andrew, Jackson plays famed playwright Andrew Sterling, who decides to move to a seemingly liberal, fictional Massachusetts island. While he's

DeNiro and Grodin shine in witty Midnight Run

By MARTIN BROWN
Collegian Correspondent

This week i decided to recommend a comedy for a rental. Comedy is one of the harder genres to critique, because nobody has the same sense of humor. But I think I have picked a movie that is so good that even people with no sense of humor whatsoever will like. (I asked my Psychology professor, and he liked it. . . just kidding.)

Anyway, Midnight Run is, in it's own sly way, a movie about integrity. Not an easy subject to base a comedy movie on, but it works beautifully. Considering what Hollywood is trying to pass off as funny these days, (Encino Man? — come on) I sometimes wonder if it's possible. That's why as a movie fan, Midnight Run was such a pleasant surprise. It is very funny, yet is also intelligent, touching and exciting to watch.

Video Pick of the Week

The Midnight Run's plot isn't what makes the movie great, but it is anyway. Robert De Niro plays Jack Walsh, a burned-out bounty hunter hired to bring back Jonathan Mardukis, an accountant who stole $15 million from the Mafia and gave it to charity. Walsh finds Mardukis easy enough in New York, but runs into a few problems getting him to Los Angeles.

The Mafia wants to kill Mardukis so he won't testify in court against them. The FBI wants Mardukis to testify against the Mafia in federal court. Another bounty hunter wants him so he can collect the money instead of Walsh. Mardukis wants to escape because he knows that the Mafia will have him killed before he can make it to any witness protection program. To make matters worse, Mardukis is afraid of flying. I know it sounds complicated, but it really isn't. Honest.

Charles Grodin plays Mardukis the accountant perfectly. He does the nice guy in dire circumstances with a laid back ease that only confident experienced actors seem to know how to play just right.

In one scene, Mardukis is fed up with being dragged around the country. The Mafia is chasing him, Walsh (De Niro) and another bounty hunter in a helicopter and Mardukis (Grodin) just spins out. He starts ranting how, "You guys are the dumbest bounty hunters I've ever seen, you couldn't even deliver a bottle of milk."

Robert De Niro is not an easy actor to share the screen with, and Grodin is handcuffed to him for a good part of the movie. Yet Grodin matches De Niro flawlessly.

Which brings me to Robert De Niro — what can you say? Just as Jack Nicholson can do the crazy guy just right, De Niro can do the tough angry guy better than anyone. Just look at his movies — Raging Bull, Taxi Driver, Cape Fear, Goodfellas and The Untouchables. The works speak for themselves.

Second to Dustin Hoffman, Robert De Niro is the best actor around. He's perfect as the quiet angry man that Jack Walsh is. This is one of De Niro's best performances because he is able to not only convey the honesty of the character, but also the little personality quirks everybody has.

The supporting cast does an exceptional job also. Most noticably Joe Pantoliano (Guido in Risky Business) as Eddie Moscone, the sleazy bail bondsman that Walsh works for. Dennis Farina also does his best work as Jimmy Serrano, a Mafia kingpin who destroyed Walsh's life.

The movie was produced and directed by Martin Brest, who is currently up for Academy Awards for Best Director and Best Picture for A Scent of a Woman. Brest also did Beverly Hills Cop, a picture that is pretty good and made a lot of money, but is not nearly as interesting or funny as Midnight Run.

The Goats eat success

Tricks of the Shade a great new album

By JEFF CROFTS
Collegian Staff

Tricks of the Shade
The Goats
Ruffhouse/Columbia Records

If you are looking for a solid, new no-frills rap album, you could do no wrong in picking up Tricks of the Shade, the debut album from The Goats.

The Goats hail from Philadelphia and feature three rappers, OaTiekato, Swayzack and Madd backed up by a five piece band, DJ 1 Take Willie and singer Rucyl Mills. With Tricks of the Shade, The Goats bring forth rap's first "hip-hopera".

Interspersed between songs are little skits which feature the travels of two brothers through a carnival looking for their mother, seeking the help (which does not come) of "Uncle Scam."

These skits, in a humorous way, portray the hopelessness of the inner city in today's society. As for the actual songs, The Goats come right out gunning from the get go with "Typical American."

"Typical American" starts out with a funky bass line leading right into the songs' fierce chorus. With sirens in the background, band members angrily yell/chant, "I'm not your typical American, I'm not your typical American." This song is definitely the highlight of Tricks of the Shade. It is a song which will stick in your head for days after you first hear it.

The rest of the album is strong as well, with different styles prevailing. The only thing each song has in common is the tough, rugged rhyming style and subjects that the group's three rappers flow on.

"Whatcha Got is Whatcha Gettin'" is a

The machinations of psychedelia

By GINA LARSON
Collegian Correspondent

Attention Pink Floyd fans! For all of those who are waiting for scientists to make time travel possible to see the genuine Pink Floyd play live — The Machine offers you a more reasonable alternative. This is an interview that took place with The Machine's drummer, Todd.

C: O.K., we'll start off with the generics. Who's in the band and what does each one of you do?

Todd: Oh, no. Well, there's Joe Pascarell on vocals and guitar, Adam Price who plays bass, Wess Nagy, whose the newest member added in the summer of '91, and he plays the keyboards and then there's myself, Todd Cohen. I play drums.

C: How long have you been playing together?

Todd: Well, Joe, Adam and myself have been together for a long time, about eight years in different bands and such, but The Machine didn't get started until four years ago.

C: And where exactly did the idea for a Pink Floyd cover band come from?

Todd: We would play around with Floyd songs and we were really impressed by the sound we were receiving from the band. Our singer has an amazingly similar voice to that of the band. When we first started playing we didn't really play all Floyd tunes. It was about 70 percent Floyd and 30 percent other cover tunes. Then as the public really became interested in what we were doing with Floyd, we gradually pushed out all of the other stuff. But we still really enjoy doing a Grateful Dead cover once in a while.

C:Has the public been receptive to you as a Floyd cover band?

Todd: Yeah, the public seems to enjoy us because we are not a completely strict cover band. You're not going to come to our shows and see Floyd. We're not Floyd. A lot of cover bands get up on stage, and you see a lot of acting where they [the cover band members] are trying to be that band. We don't dress or try to look like [Floyd]. We play their music, but we let our own personalities come through, playing some improv on the songs.

C: Are you experimenting with or trying to put out any of your own music?

Todd: We have been working on some of our own stuff. Mostly our singer, Joe has been writing the stuff. We would really like to try to get our own stuff out there and recorded and played — we're looking for the right time though. Of course, we wouldn't start our stuff under "The Machine." We'd try it with another name, since people relate "The Machine" to a Floyd cover band.

C: Does the music you've been writing have Floyd influences?

Todd: Good question . . . I guess it does but it's not really intentional. We're not trying to redo Floyd songs in our own music. I'm sure that the music we've written has been influenced and shows some of the qualities of Floyd, but it's not another rendition of "Comfortably Numb" or "Wish You Were Here."

C: The band tours around a lot. You play in Boston, New York, Providence, Connecticut — how has that been for the band?

Todd: We've been really lucky. None of us have jobs besides this band. This is our full time job, so we've been really lucky in that respect. However, with the slow down in the economy we have lost some gigs. For example, in 1991 we played about 190 shows and last year we only played about 140. We love getting out and playing though. It's been a lot of fun for us.

C: Anything interesting ever happen to the band while touring?

Todd: Well, our bus blew up in Georgia once but . . . We're not like a typical rock band. We're not up in hotels till four o'clock in the morning partying and trashing the place. Another one of the members is really in to Chess and Chess magazines. Everybody is really down to earth.

C: The Collegian has run a series of editorials this past week on the controversy over the legalization of marijuana. What do you think?

Todd: I would be really interested to see how society would handle the legalization, whether more people would smoke or not.

After that, the interview turned to talking about shows, including the show tonight in Northampton. I advise all of you to trek down to Pearl Street tonight for an evening of Pink Floyd psychedelia.

Understanding Eating Disorders:
Strategies for Friends and Family
Tuesday - March 9
6 p.m.- 8 p.m.
UHS - Room 304

I think my roommate has an eating disorder. How can I be sure? What should I do?

I think my sister is anorexic and she isn't getting any help. How can I convince her to see a professional? Who should I suggest...Where should she go?

I'm concerned about my friend who has bulimia. She says it's under control, but I don't think it is. I'm really afraid...What can I do to help?

If you're concerned about someone who you know or suspect is struggling with an eating disorder, come to this informal workshop to explore how you can help and cope with these issues.

Stain: Living Colour is back with a vengeance

By CALEB COCHRAN
Collegian Staff

Stain
Living Colour
Epic

With each new album they release, Living Colour seems to drift further and further from the mainstream of commercial rock 'n' roll. The band's latest release, Stain, continues the band's trend of rejecting the norm and playing their own brand of creative and stimulating rock.

After a commercially successful debut album, 1988's Vivid, Living Colour followed up in 1990 with Time's Up, an album which did not enjoy great commercial success despite being just as powerful and more diverse than Vivid.

With Stain, the band has again recorded an album which does not fit easily into such categories as metal, pop or alternative. Stain is such a rich and creative collection, however, that trying to categorize the band's music is unnecessary.

The band opted for a harder sound and a heavier mood on Stain, and, with a few exceptions, the result is a focused attack which leaves the listener reeling and yearning for more.

The first single released from the album, "Leave It Alone," is the song most likely to be heard on MTV. It's a catchy tune with typically sharp vocals turned in by Corey Glover and some snazzy guitar riffs from Vernon Reid.

The real meat of the album, however, comes elsewhere. The best song on the album is the fast and furious rocker "Auslander." The word auslander means "foreigner," according to the band's drummer, William Calhoun, who discovered the term while doing a drum clinic in Germany.

"It refers to immigrants who've come to Germany from Turkey and Greece and other countries." The song discusses the feelings that these "foreigners" have as they move into a new country.

The chorus, in which Glover sings: "Everything that I want/Isn't everything that you've got," means "I don't want your job or your house, I want my own job, my own house and the opportunity to earn those things," says Calhoun.

The song rocks along at a breakneck pace and conveys the feelings of the auslanders, and all outsiders, with hard-hitting emotion.

Another triumphant thrasher is "Never Satisfied," an angry track which again utilizes the razor-sharp vocals of Glover and the thunderous guitar of Reid to create a tangible feeling of rage.

"Bi" is a clever track about bisexuality based partially on the personal experiences of Reid, who says, "Will wrote the music and I wrote the words because I was involved with a bisexual woman and we had some really. . . interesting situations that came up." Musically, the tune is built around some upbeat riffs and funky beats, most notably at the end of the tune, which bears uncanny resemblance to the work of 3rd Bass.

COLLEGIAN / AMY GUIP

Bisexuals are another example of outcasts, Reid says, and this album is all about outcasts. "There's a theme here of outsiders, of outcasts, of flawed characters — because a stain is a flaw. I think we all have the stain of original sin, and that's a theme here too."

The most intriguing song on the album is the eerie "Nothingness," a tune about depression and escaping to a land which is absent of everything except the self. Glover sang this song into a satellite dish outside the recording studio, and the sound produced is very unusual and very appropriate for this song. Although the theme of the song is deep, Glover's voice is therapeutic here and soothes the listener's ears and soul.

The album as a whole does a fine job of showcasing the talents of the band. Glover and Reid are brilliant throughout as a powerful one-two vocal and instrumental punch, Calhoun proves creative and effective on the skins and bassist Doug Wimbish earns his keep on his first project with the band.

Regardless of whether or not this album receives the praise of MTV pop fans, Stain is a winner. Powerful and focused, inspired and moving, this stellar collection proves that Living Colour has the guts to paint outside the lines.

funky acoustical piece with the surprisingly laid back, but still harsh subject lyrics stealing the show. "Do The Digs Dug?" is another impressive song which features the strong rhythm section sending out a hard beat. "Dug's" chorus, as in "Typical American" is very catchy and sticks in your craw. (C'mon don't you remember when Bobby Brady said that phrase?)

"Wrong Pot 2 Piss In" is a song which illustrates the frustration felt by The Goats. The song is about people in power going after the wrong people in different circumstances. In the slow horn-powered song "Tricks of the Shade," The Goats send a message that "Politicians are the shadiest breeds of the mental magicians."

Other songs which are sure to impress from the album are "RU Down Wit Da Goats," "Got Kinda Hi" and "Aaah D Yaaa". Overall Tricks of the Shade is a strong album in which The Goats get their points across either by using humor in their skits or smart, powerful lyrics in their songs.

moving his stereo in, his white neighbors (Michael Lerner and Margaret Colin) assume that since he's Black, he must be stealing the stereo.

The archetype crooked police captain (Dabney Coleman) and his force attack the house. When the captain realizes his mistake, he hires a petty crook named Amos (Nicholas Cage) to fake a hostage takeover.

But when the media and protesters, led by the rabble-rousing Reverend Brunch (Giancarlo Esposito), get involved, Cage and Jackson find themselves in a real-life standoff with Coleman, the SWAT team and the media.

The laughs go something like this: ha, ha, ha, THUD. This just isn't funny. Frye is trying to say something about how we view ourselves and others but there is an uneven rhythm. One scene is slapstick, the next is a drippy exchange between the "gruff" Black man and the "loose" White man, all while trying to move the plot along.

Cage manages to strain out some laughs, but its hard to see the character behind his grungy stubble. After winning roles in Peggy Sue Got Married, Raising Arizona, Wild At Heart and Moonstruck, Cage seems to have settled in a run of weak but genial comedies (Honeymoon In Vegas). It's frustrating to see an actor with so much maniac potential go through the paces yet again.

Samuel L. Jackson — when was the last good movie he was in? You have to stretch back to 1991's Jungle Fever to find a solid performance. After crummy roles in equally drab movies (White Sands, National Lampoon's Loaded Weapon 1), Jackson better wise up before he starts guest-starring on "Street Justice" with Carl Weathers.

When they're on screen together, they get stuck in hurling insults or (groan) learning about each other. There's a particular moment where Jackson ties Cage's tie for him and tells of his childhood. Mrs. Butterworth would be in syrup heaven.

What Frye doesn't seem to understand is that when trying to break down stereotypes with stereotypes, you'd better have a cohesive vision and a solid character or two at the center. Unfortunately, Amos & Andrew has neither. What a waste of time and talent.

Like another cartoonish movie that toyed with social satire, The Bonfire of the Vanities, Amos & Andrew ends up making everyone look really stupid. At least Bonfire had arty cinematography and some seemingly on-purpose bad acting by its three stars, Bruce Willis, Melanie Griffith and Tom Hanks.

What's left of Amos & Andrew, after all is said and done, is a collection of hollow social statements and misfired comedy. By the time Sir Mix-A-Lot ("Baby Got Back") recounts the entire plot in a rap song over the closing credits, you'll wish you stayed home and rented Bonfire of the Vanities. At least then you can heckle Melanie Griffith. D+

my first chance to do a lead in a film. I think it's a natural progression of my career."

After years as an acclaimed character actor, Jackson asserts that the similarities between character roles and lead roles aren't that far removed.

"Andrew is a character. The difference being that I was on-camera a lot more" and adding with a chuckle, "I stayed on location the whole shoot."

Jackson claims that being the lead doesn't mean the role doesn't have its challenges.

"Andrew is a lead character actor — he's not a leading man in the sense that, you know, the kind of all-American guy who gets the girls and has this dilemma to solve. He's a man who has quirks, pimples," Jackson says.

The road from supporting work to Amos & Andrew has been long, but has given Jackson a dizzying resume of film roles, and the opportunity more than once to show his immense talent on the stage.

A graduate of Morehouse College in Atlanta, Jackson performed with the Negro Ensemble Company and a handful of New York Shakespeare Festival productions. It was his originations of two roles in reknown playwright August Wilson's plays at the Yale Reperatory, The Piano Lesson and Two Trains Running, that brought his move to Hollywood.

Jackson says, that after all of his stage and screen credits, he was not at all surprised he was offered the leads in both National Lampoon's Loaded Weapon 1 and Amos & Andrew.

"The roles were getting larger. It's kind of like any other job — you start out as a janitor, maybe somewhere as a mail room boy, and move up. I had done small things and they got bigger and bigger and bigger."

Writer E. Max Frye, best known for penning the cult fave Something Wild, says he and the producers were keen on Jackson for the lead from their first meeting.

"We brought Sam in and he was nothing like the Gator character that he did in Jungle Fever. It was a great contrast to see him like that," Frye says.

The discussion always seems to lead back to Gator and Jungle Fever. Not exactly a sore spot for Jackson, considering it catapulted him into the realm of serious film roles and, more importantly, he became the magic word in Hollywood: bankable. After such a publicized performance in such an amoral role, Jackson answers critics who say he should go out of his way to play responsible Black characters.

"Gator was responsible," Jackson says. "See, everybody wants us to be role models — nobody asks anybody else to do that."

If you want to know the real Jackson, he retorts: "Check with me. It has nothing to with the people that I kill on screen who don't really die. I've never actually been in jail for any of the crimes I've committed on screen," he says.

"So my responsibility as an actor is to be very good at every character that I accept the role to play," Jackson says. "Truth be known, the best thing I can tell people is that I do my job well and that's what most role models should do. Whatever they do, they should do well."

The question of role models soon becomes an issue of race when Jackson and Frye speak of Amos & Andrew. "[The film] looks at a very serious issue: race," says director Frye. "Perhaps using humor makes it more acceptable to a wider audience."

Frye accents the fact that he didn't want to use the film at a bully pulpit, preaching the loaded issues and insulting the audience.

"Hopefully by the end of the journey you can go 'well, there's a lot of truth in that'," Frye says.

Frye concedes that the film does indeed deal in stereotypes, but asserts that it is exactly the point. He says the film doesn't hold any sacred cows or pull any punches when satirizing any social group. Furthermore, he made a distinct effort to "hit" everybody: the good cops, bad cops, media, Whites, Blacks, etc.

"There really only is one character in here that is not a stereotype, and that's this guy, Andrew Sterling," Frye says. "That's what the movie is about: addressing the stereotypes we all have about everybody else."

Though Amos & Andrew is his first foray into directing, Frye still considers himself a writer first and foremost.

Hit or not, Jackson'll continue to pop up everywhere. Upcoming projects include Steven Spielberg's summer spectacular Jurassic Park and independent writer/director Quentin Taratino's (Reservoir Dogs) latest, True Romance. But Jackson says he would like to return to the stage.

The ideal situation for Jackson, he says, is for him to do two films and a play a year. "But not if my agent can help it."

Surrealist Paula Josa-Jones to address 'self' questions

"I want people to come with excitement and allow themselves to make their own interpretations." This is how Paula Josa-Jones hopes her audience will approach her company's Thursday night performance of her original work, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik."

Josa-Jones says that while some become preoccupied with finding the "real meaning," they miss the purpose of the performance. She assures that there is no correct or incorrect interpretation, only what the individual feels.

Inspired by the surrealist paintings and writings of Dorethea Tanning, Remedios Varo, Leonora Carrington and Leonor Fini, Josa-Jones' creative art and dance work "addresses questions about relationships with others and relationships within ones self."

Josa-Jones, who's been dancing for 25 years, founded Performance Works in 1984. This fall the Boston choreographer might have the opportunity to take her company to Australia, "either that or Atlanta," she laughs.

The hour-long performance, which consists of seven dancers and includes a solo performed by herself, is the company's first appearance at UMass.

"Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" will be at Hampden Theatre this Thursday at 8 pm. Admission is $8 for general public and $5 for Five College Area Students. Tickets can be purchased at the Fine Arts Center Box Office.

Bombing suspect arrested

By RICK HAMPSON
Associated Press

NEW YORK — A man described as a follower of a radical Muslim cleric was arrested Thursday in last week's World Trade Center bombing when he coolly tried a third time to reclaim a rental deposit on a van wrecked in the blast.

Other suspects were being sought. Law enforcement sources said the bombing appeared to be a terrorist act.

Papers that the suspect presented the rental agency were covered with nitrates, a government source, speaking on condition of anonymity, told the Associated Press. Nitrates are found in some explosives; traces of nitrates were found at the blast site.

The arrest was a sudden, major break in the most notorious U.S. bombing in years. Just a day earlier, the FBI had said it could take months to crack the case.

Friday's enormous blast in a garage beneath the twin towers killed five people, injured more than 1,000, left one missing and sent fear through the nation's largest city. The 110-story towers, the world's second-tallest buildings, home to hundreds of businesses with thousands of workers, aren't expected to reopen for a month.

WNBC-TV in New York identified the suspect as 26-year-old Salama Mohammed of Jersey City, N.J., but the station wasn't sure exactly how the name was spelled. His arraignment, initially scheduled for Thursday evening in New York City, was postponed.

The arrest came after an army of investigators spent the past week combing through piles of rubble at the blast site, fielding thousands of phone calls and pursuing scores of leads. Detectives systematically checked garage payment stubs and viewed videotapes of entering vehicles.

Investigators turned up charred pieces of the rental van around the perimeter of the blast site, indications that the van might have held the explosives, a source said on condition of anonymity.

The suspect had rented the van from a Ryder truck agent in Jersey City on Feb. 23 and returned less than two hours after the explosion Friday afternoon to say it had been stolen from him in Jersey City, said Paul Mascitelli, owner of a car dealership that shares an office with the Ryder agent.

The man wanted his $400 cash deposit back but was told he would need a police report of the theft, Mascitelli said. He said the suspect returned Monday without the police report and again was turned away.

On Thursday morning, the man called the Ryder office and spoke with an FBI agent posing as a Ryder official, said Patrick Galasso, the truck rental agent.

"He didn't want to give up that $400. He just wanted that money," Galasso added.

The man was accompanied by another man when he rented the truck, but was alone on subsequent visits, Galasso said. He said he didn't remember what the second man looked like.

Both Mascitelli and Galasso said the suspect didn't behave nervously in any way. Mascitelli described him as short and frail with a beard and a thick accent.

Prof examines violence

Women learn new cultural perspective

"We must recognize the violence that is bringing us down," said Helan Page, a University of Massachusetts anthropology professor, during a panel discussion titled "Women of Color: A Cross-Cultural Perspective" in last weekend's Women's Conference.

Page spoke of "vertical" and "symbolic" violence. She used the European colonization of Africa as an example of these types of violence.

Page said an example of vertical violence was the Europeans' coming to Zimbabwe and destroying everything the natives had in order to take power. The effect on the African woman was great.

"Once people have had their homes and fields destroyed, the women have lost their basis of power," Page said.

Through the extension of agricultural education, which told Africans that their way of cultivating fields was not the right way, symbolic violence was done, Page said.

She said symbolic violence has "coerced [women] to think that they are weak, that their enemies are their fathers, uncles, brothers and husbands."

But, according to Page, the African woman was never subordinate to the African man, as many white women feminists would like to think.

"How could that be if the women ran the granaries?," she said. "When you are in charge of the distribution of food, you're very important."

Page shared a story about Sam Page, a friend of hers who is White, and has a Black son. She told the packed room how Sam Page used to play a game with her son saying the word "nigger." Page told Sam that the word is detrimental to her son, but Sam just laughed it off.

"I like Sam Page, but I don't like her racism," Page said.

Computer equipment stolen from Hasbrouck Laboratory

By MICHAEL WEBBER

Computer equipment valued at approximately $9,000 was reported stolen from Hasbrouck Laboratory early yesterday morning, University police said.

Police said the door to Hasbrouck 128, a lecture preparation area where the equipment was stored, appeared to have been kicked in, and it looked as if a chair had been used to break the glass window in the door. Also reported stolen was a VCR valued at $500.

The stolen items included an Apple Macintosh Quadra 700 computer, color monitor and a device used to allow computer output to be displayed on an overhead projector, according to Bill Leonard, a post-doctoral research associate involved with the equipment.

Leonard said the equipment was part of a new system being tested to allow students and professors to get more feedback from each other in large lectures. He said the system was developed at Christopher Newport University in Virginia under a National Science Foundation grant, and was being tested at a number of universities including the University of Massachusetts.

Leonard said a key feature of the system, implemented for the first time about two weeks ago in a physics class, was that it allowed students to respond individually to questions asked in a lecture by means of keypads at their desks. The responses were then fed into a central computer, the now-stolen Macintosh, where the professor could respond to them.

Physics Professor Bill Gerace, who teaches the lecture where the system was in use, said the theft would be a "great disappointment" to his students, but that he would continue teaching by more traditional methods until the system was replaced.

Monroe Rabin, physics department head, said he expected the equipment

Gov. Commission suggests adding GLB curriculum

By MELANIE DESILVA

According to an article in last Friday's Boston Globe by Don Aucion, the Governor's Commission on Gay and Lesbian youth has recommended that gay curriculum be mainstreamed into Massachusetts high school classrooms.

The commission, formed last year in response to statistics showing a high rate of suicide among gay youth, advocates the integration of films and books on homosexuality into libraries, gay history and literature into the classroom and social awareness training for teachers, according to the Globe reporter.

Sandy Bosselaer, facilitator for the UMass Lesbian Bisexual Women's Union, said the education she received growing up in a conservative subur-

Student government lacks a unified vision for the future that students can carry out in years to come, Kevin Jourdain, student trustee candidate, said.

"I want to develop a sense of continuance in the Board of Trustees," Jourdain said. "Every trustee has been going in as a fresh entity. I want to develop a 10-year perspective for trustees so we can make a concerted effort."

Jourdain said he would develop a "blueprint" for the role of student trustee if elected. This would outline long-term goals for student government and would be voted on by the entire student body.

Jourdain said he hopes to work on University admissions policy, alumni service, University Health Services reorganization and reinstatement of Legal Services' litigation rights.

"If I'm elected student trustee, it's going to be a whole new government," Jourdain said.

Jourdain is a senior political science and economics major. He will be pursuing a master's degree in public administration in the fall.

Jourdain came to the University in 1989 on a Margaret J. Hyland four-year scholarship. He has held numerous positions on campus, including seats on the Dean of Students Academic Honesty Board and Housing Judicial Board, a position on the Board of Governors and Civility Commission, the presidency of the Republican Club, and membership of Delta Chi fraternity.

Jourdain worked in 1989 as a legislative assistant for the late U.S. Rep. Silvio Conte and worked for Republican Steven Pierce during the 1990 state election primaries.

He later supported Gov. Weld in the election and met him at the state Republican Convention.

Jourdain became a senator representing the commuter area in May 1991. This semester he was removed from the roster due to three unexcused absences from Senate meetings, Mike Foster, speaker of the Senate, said.

Jourdain attributed the absences to frustration with the meetings.

"Nothing ever gets done in meetings," Jourdain said. "But I'm completely on top of the issues. I'm in the SGA office every day."

Jourdain also called for an inside investigation of University tuition and fees.

"I want to get my hands on the treasurer's book of the University and give a detailed report on it to the student population," Jourdain said. "I want to analyze exactly what we can trim and find out how we can provide the best service to students and not be an employment agency."

Jourdain said he would advocate a student-administration forum to improve communication on campus.

"The students feel disenfranchised right now," Jourdain said. "If they could sit down once a month with SGA officers, the chancellor, vice chancellor, department heads and staff members to talk about their concerns, it would help," Jourdain said he would pursue expanded bus service for the University, better parking policies, more handicapped facilities and University funding for the Newman Center, since its cafeteria is widely used by students.

He said his experience in campus and state government would be an asset to the student trustee positon.

"Do you want an experienced person or do you want an inexperienced person?" Jourdain said. "I know the power structure in Boston. I can get in to see Weld."

Jourdain said his view of the student trustee position differs from that of other candidates.

I'm not playing the game," Jourdain said. "These other guys are doing this for a resume builder. I'm going to be postering the issues."

State Police Breakup Whitmore Sit-in; Carry off 34

Throughout the afternoon the group prepared for the evening vigil. A large supply of food was purchased and instructions on courses of action when the police came were given at periodic intervals.

The protest against all recruiting began Monday when the Committee brought a demand to Dean Field asking that a public debate with the Dow Chemical recruiter be held before he met with interviewees. One member of the committee stated the debate would enable those being interviewed "to understand what kind of company they would be working for."

Dean Field told the group "It is my attempt to dissuade you from remaining.

Several minutes later the state police, in full riot equipment entered the lobby and carried the students out in a swift operation. Each student was carried by two policemen. In response to a manner which some present believe to be overly forceful, several authorized spectators and demonstrators shouted at police to "take it easy, take it easy, they want to go". A State Police officer supervised the operation with the same warning to "take it easy".

New director to head Alumni Relations

By KENDRA WILLETT
Collegian Staff

Building a bridge between students and alumni is one of the many goals that the new director of the Office of Alumni Relations, John Fuedo, is hoping to accomplish.

Previously the director of Alumni Field Services at Tufts University, Fuedo referred to his decision to come to the University of Massachusetts as "a tremendous opportunity with two things to look forward to — quantity and quality."

According to Fuedo, UMass has the biggest alumni organization in the state. Although alumni organizations were once thought of as social groups, it is important that students realize that the Alumni Relations is important to them before and after their attendance at the University.

"Alumni care very deeply about the University and the students," Fuedo said. "For the rest of a student's life the Alumni Association will have an effect on them."

Programs like giving scholarships of $750 to 60 juniors for their achievements, and senior student leader recognition are two examples of ways that the Alumni Association recognizes students.

Fuedo said even when it comes to problems, such as racial tension on campus, the alumni get involved by offering information and outreach.

"If there is a problem, we work towards the benefit of the students," Fuedo said.

As manager of membership and public relations for Toastmasters International, a non-profit educational organization, Fuedo became interested in reaching out to thousands of people around the world.

"There was a great deal of satisfaction knowing that I could make an impact on so many people," Fuedo said.

Fuedo said he took the job at UMass because "it is a great chance to come into contact with thousands of people."

The Alumni Career Network helps students find jobs when they graduate, and the main objective of the program is to create UMass connections all over the world, according to Fuedo.

"I'm here to help fulfill President Hooker's mission — to make the University of Massachusetts the most respected University in the country," Fuedo said.

Maintaining ties with the University and bringing UMass alumni together all around the world has created ongoing connections with a tremendous response, according to Fuedo.

"These past two and a half weeks have

WOCH back to pump up the volume

By MICHAEL WEBBER
Collegian Staff

Orchard Hill residential area's cable radio station, WOCH, went back on the air at 9 a.m. yesterday after being shut down since last November, because of complaints about offensive broadcasts, WOCH General Manager Thomas Baiter said.

Officials at Housing Services Cable Network, over whose system the station broadcasts, turned WOCH back on after consulting with station managers who had clarified broadcasting guidelines in the station's constitution, Laurel Hellerstein, manager of HSCN, said.

Assistant Director for Residential Education Anne Miller said Housing had received complaints about graphic descriptions of sex and masturbation being broadcast, and decided to take the station off the air until new guidelines could be set.

WOCH's constitution now expressly states that

Have the post-graduation blues?

Director of Career Center offers job search advice

By MICHELLE A. NAPOLI
Collegian Correspondent

If you are a jittery senior feeling insecure and helpless in your search for post-graduation employment, fret not. Joan Stoia, director of the Mather Career Center, has some practical words of wisdom.

"Be strategic," she said. "Sit back, analyze what events are taking place in the economy, make sure that you understand what your particular passions and strengths are, and then find. . . the best place possible to perform your specialty."

Although this year's job market is not particularly promising, it is better than last year's, Stoia said.

"There seems to be a little bit of light at the end of the tunnel," she said. "Whether it will reveal itself entirely in time for this graduating class or not is another question."

Today, Stoia said, jobs in engineering and the sciences are experiencing a "shrinkage," despite recent expansion in these fields. She said employment opportunities are most abundant in sales and the financial industry.

"It's really a job market in transition," Stoia said.

So now that you're facing reality, where do you start? Ideally, you should have started in September, but there's no better time than the present.

First of all, go down to the Mather Career Center and get a workshop schedule. The Center offers an introductory workshop which will help to get things rolling.

"You can't learn all of this if you come to the Career Center once, fill out some forms and bug out of here," Stoia said.

You'll need to do some self-assessment and investigate different occupations to find the ones that interest you. The Career Center has computer programs, a library and an experienced staff which help students do this, Stoia said.

Your next step, according to Stoia, should be to attend workshops on resume writing, interviewing skills and finding employment in the "hidden job market." Then start applying for "anything that moves."

Other key moves are to attend career fairs and alumni panels, develop a prospect list for yourself and submit your resume to the Center's resume referral service. This can help you get "one-of-a-kind jobs," usually with smaller companies which do not recruit on campus.

In fact, most of the jobs available, about 85 percent according to Stoia, are these one-of-a-kind opportunities within the "hidden job market." So while you should undoubtedly apply for those jobs which are being actively recruited for on campus, you'll need the skills to know how and where to look on your own.

"You might as well learn to do [a job search] the right way now," Stoia said, since we're all bound to change our jobs more than several times in our careers.

Lesbian video explores relationship to church

By ANN MARIE NEAL
Collegian Staff

"Among Good Christian Peoples," a lesbian interracial video collaborated on by Jacqueline Woodson and Catherine Saalfield, was shown last night in the Campus Center.

The video is an autobiographical essay written by Woodson to show the pull between the desire for religious community and personal freedom.

"There's been a contradiction between the church and being gay and lesbian. This video is a way to prove that there's a balance," Woodson said.

The video depicted the lives of many Christian men and women that are gay and lesbian.

The video shows Woodson's experiences seeking community while growing up and as an adult, being the only writer in a family of Jehovah's Witnesses, being the only lesbian in her sorority, Alpha Kappa Alpha, and having a White lover.

"I wanted to be Puerto Rican instead of Black. I wanted to be bow-legged instead of straight-legged. I wanted to be big-breasted instead of flat-chested. I wanted to be in the world rather than of the world," Woodson said.

Woodson said she would rather be in the world than of the world because she too was normal.

"Like Judy, I too called up to God. Yo Jehovah, are you there? It's me, Jackie," said Woodson. "I too wanted to be a part of my surroundings, but my homegirls were not having it, and my mother threw me out. I was told never to have sleep-overs again. I did. I was caught in my bed with another woman and she threw me out. I was on my own at 14-years-old," she said.

"I pledged the AKA sorority at 17. I wanted to be a part of a sisterhood love. They were dedicated to two things; being light skinned and having an allegiance to their fraternity brothers. We couldn't eat anything that was red, white or yellow because those were the colors of our rivals," Woodson said.

Woodson said she felt isolated. She was dark-skinned and chose to keep her sexual preference hidden. The sorority was a contradiction to her need for a sisterly love.

"At 11 we were taught how to grease our forehead for a fight, but we were never taught how to love another woman," she said.

Woodson and Saalfield are currently working on a feature film on interracial relationships in lesbian communities.

Authorities negotiate with doomsday prophet

By LAURA TOLLEY
Associated Press

WACO, Texas — Authorities locked in a standoff for a fifth day with a doomsday prophet and his armed cult negotiated today for the release of the brother of a boy who left the compound Wednesday carrying a box of puppies.

Negotiations by telephone went on sporadically through the night between agents and those inside the fortified compound overseen by David Koresh.

A boy carrying 12 puppies was released from the second compound Wednesday evening, said Francesca Perot, a spokeswoman for the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms. The puppies' mother was killed in a shootout Sunday between federal agents and cult members and the puppies had not been fed since, she said.

Perot said negotiations this morning focused on the release of a 20th child, the brother of the boy who was released Wednesday.

Nineteen children and 90 adults were believed to still be inside, the FBI said.

Four federal agents were killed in Sunday's gun battle. A federal source speaking on condition of anonymity said at least 10 cultists had been killed.

The Houston Chronicle, citing an unidentified source, said law officers planned to cut off electricity at the compound today.

A Texas Utilities Co. truck drove into the secured area near the compound this morning. Perot said she could not confirm plans to turn off the power.

Koresh, the 33-year-old leader of the Branch Davidians, got the FBI to put out a rambling religious message on the radio Tuesday, but he reneged on a promise to surrender, saying he'd received a message from God to await instructions.

Federal agents brought in two portable office buildings Wednesday for use as a command post outside the 77-acre compound, apparently settling in for what could be a long siege.

"The goal is to resolve this situation ultimately in federal court with no further bloodshed," FBI agent Jeffrey Jamar said.

The cult is a well-trained, committed fighting force with a "massive weapons cache," Earl K. Dunagan, an ATF agent, said in court papers.

The standoff began Sunday when a raid by ATF agents erupted in a gun battle. Another gun battle occurred later in the day. The agents had intended to arrest Koresh on weapons charges and search the compound.

Dan Harnett, ATF associate director, said the cultists had received a call warning them of the raid. "There is no doubt they were expecting our arrival," he said.

Lloyd Sandstrom, who lived near the compound, said he saw cult members buy about $3,000 worth of food two weeks ago. "I'm sure they've got to be stocked pretty well for this," he said.

The Houston Chronicle, citing an unidentified source, said law officers planned to cut off electricity at the compound today.

A Texas Utilities Co. truck drove into the secured area near the compound this morning. Perot said she could not confirm plans to turn off the power.

Two elderly women who left the compound were initially charged with participating in the first gun battle. The charges were dropped Wednesday but the women, ages 75 and 77, remained jailed as material witnesses.

ATF spokeswomen Sharon Wheeler would not say why the charges were dropped.

the station will abide by federal obscenity laws, which prohibit the broadcast of material whose "predominant appeal is to the prurient interest, that is, a shameful or morbid interest in nudity, sex or excretion, and if in addition it goes beyond customary limits of candor in describing or representing such matters."

All DJs must sign a form saying they accept and understand the guidelines before they are allowed to go on the air, Baiter said.

He said the station's managing staff came up with most of the revisions in the constitution, but Housing did review their work and request some clarifications and changes.

"We're unhappy with some of the limitations, but we understand them. ...We have to abide by their rules. It's more important to have a radio station with some limitations than a station that gets turned off," Baiter said.

Area Coordinator for Orchard Hill/Central Matt Ouellett, who works as a consultant with WOCH, said the new guidelines are not intended to censor broadcasts, but to protect the station from possible legal problems.

"We just want to make sure they're on safe legal ground," Ouellett said. "We wanted to insure they have a good understanding of obscenity laws."

Baiter said he thinks the restructuring will mark the end to the station's rocky past.

"Our biggest goal is to become more credible. I hope this is going to be the big turning point for the station."

Is justice served when a convicted rapist walks free?

Convicted child rapist Blake Gibson walked out of Hampden Superior Court a free man on Tuesday, yet another criminal laughing in the face of our inept and crippled justice system.

During an emotional trial a month earlier, a 16-year-old girl was repeatedly attacked by the defense before a courtroom of strange faces. She bravely described in detail how Gibson, a relative of hers, raped and molested her in Southwick in 1990 when she was 13 years old.

Her younger sister also testified, and told the jury how she too had been molested by Gibson on a number of occasions after her sister was raped, although no charges were brought by her.

So on Feb. 12 the jury came to its decision and convicted Gibson, 30, of statutory rape of a child relative and molesting a child relative. The decision was also upheld by the judge. Although Gibson had destroyed the children's youth and undoubtedly scarred them indefinitely, so-called "justice" seemed to have been served in the courts of America.

Flipping through a survey of 2400 colleges and universities published by "The Chronicle of Higher Education," one realizes how widespread the non-reporting of rape is. Many schools actually reported no incidents of rape on campus in the past year, an indication of how paralyzing rape is. The incidents are simply not reported because victims fear publicity, shame, and ultimately, defeat in court. (UMass, to its credit, reported 18 rapes — more than any other participating school in the nation.)

Gary
DEANE

But Blake Gibson was brought into a court, and had a trial before a jury of his peers because of the bravery of his young victim. All that needed to be done after the jury handed down a guilty verdict was the sentencing. It is here where the lawyers and judges and legalities take over and produce their magic.

Assistant District Attorney Donna Donato argued for a 12 to 15-year prison sentence. Defense lawyer Terry Scott Nagel thought probation sounded fairer. Somehow a compromise was reached, and Gibson was sentenced to a mere two years in jail. Two years for the rape and molestation of a young relative is quite clearly a travesty of justice, but unfortunately the jury's verdict was subject to further disrespect.

The case was appealed, and would take years for the case to reach an appeals court due to further disorganization of the system. Nagel argued that because Gibson was sentenced to only two years, it wouldn't make much sense for Gibson to serve his sentence out before the appeal could be heard. Donato objected in vain to a stay of execution (lawspeak for "abused loophole") because, as you might remember, the jury convicted Gibson, guilty beyond a reasonable doubt.

So convicted child rapist Blake Gibson walked out of Hampden Superior Court on Tuesday, the product of a judicial system that balances upon the notion of cruel and unusual punishment.

As Judge Daniel A. Ford walked from his bench and left the courtroom, the victim saw her mother screaming at the judge, demanding to know how long Gibson was to be allowed to walk the open streets, set free after raping her child. She turned to the dozens of people crowding Gibson's side of the courtroom and saw his family, his friends and his minister breathe a deep sigh of relief mixed with exhaustion.

The teen faced these strangers in the court and said, "You people will all find out when he does it to your kids."

Enter the Jerky Brothers: funny guys from stage right

"I don't have to talk to you, jerky. Let me speak to Brett Ware!"

A jerky revolution is sweeping the nation.

"I hear ya, fruitcake. See ya later, tough guy."

For those of you who are unaware of this revolution, let me explain. A week ago, I would've thought that the jerky revolution had something to do with an increase in personal hedonistic pleasure.

Michael
MORRISSEY

Over a long car trip, I was told that the "Jerky Brothers," a bootleg compilation tape of crank phone calls was the funniest thing since "Jim's Journal."

"When was the last time you drove a tractor trailer?"

"I stole one down in Jersey a few weeks ago, drove it right through the turnpike, didn't stop for the [expletive] tolls or nothing. I was popping wheelies, I'm silly."

People from Notre Dame to St. John's to Cal State Northridge to UMass are all acquainted with this new strain of jerky.

The tapes vary from state to state, but most include calls everywhere from 911 to a demolition company to a dentist malpractice office to a moving company.

"I'm silly, my friends call me rubberneck."

The premise is simple. The comedian looks up a company in the classified ads, calls them up in some sort of disguised voice and promptly insults the receptionist. Underground sources tell me the culprit is a comic named John Valbey, an American genius. Valbey imitates a Jewish man, an Italian, an Indian and a homosexual in various skits, all tastelessly done.

"Hello, is Crystal there? I'm calling about the modelling job. I want to come down and show you my goods, show you what I'm made of.

"Are you experienced in runway modelling?"

"Runway is old hat to me. My real talent is I rub gasoline all over my body, and then I light myself on fire. The crowd loves it."

College students love the jerky tape, and WBCN in Boston was playing excerpts of it on "Comedy Lunch Hour." All of a sudden, there is a surge of the tapes, and the demand far outweighs the supply. While the tapes can be ordered through WBCN, most people have simply copied the tape from friends.

Voice mail systems on UMass have been filled with jerky messages, passed on from one to another. The jerky tape now inhabits many people's answering machine messages.

While finding a crank phone call funny appeals to the basest interest of people and makes us seem like 10-year-olds, there is a need for laughter in society. "Saturday Night Live" isn't as funny as it once was, nor is "In Living Color."

Enter the jerky brothers, stage right.

"I'm calling about the job repairing motors. You need bench work? I can do 350 easy!"

"350 pieces?"

"Yeah, yeah. . . pieces, what the [expletive] are you talking about? No, pounds, 350 pounds. I do calves, thighs, the whole nine yards. Plus, I can build a starter engine."

PC people will say it's inherently wrong to crank call someone, and it's wrong to imitate an Indian, wrong to call a receptionist "Sweetcakes" and ask her if she has big hands to hold a hot dog.

My response to these killjoys?

"I hear ya, fruitcake."

Bitter truth makes men defensive

It's really too bad that all these men responding to Stephanie Eisenberg's column have to feel defensive and reply to it negatively [Collegian, March 4].

Most editorials in the Collegian are incredibly inane and no one responds to them. When I read her column, I thought, "This is right on." I do experience these things every single day of my life. I also spent several years in the "real world" before coming here and I have been subjected to that behavior incessantly. You wouldn't know about it; you don't go through it.

If these men feel upset by her "accusations" they should do something about it instead of whining about male-bashing. Why are women responsible for stopping the behavior of men? The only way it will stop is by men modifying their own behavior, and helping other men see what they are doing.

Mr. Knowles replied, "Your negative male generalizations and lack of a point (do you need a house to fall on you?) makes me think more about whether to educate you or belittle you rather than think about the subject at hand."

And Mr. Cooke responded, "male-bashing is not the correct channel through which to remedy the situation," and, "You have made it into the editorial hall of shame."

These are real things. I experience them. I refuse to let you invalidate my experience. The truth hurts, but when you get over the pain I would greatly appreciate your help in changing your colleagues attitudes so they more reflect yours, if you are as supportive as you say. She speaks the truth, so deal with it.

Steinem can't 'give' self-authority

This letter is in response to two women who were quoted in the article, "Steinem inspires people to seek self-authority [Collegian, March 1]."

One woman said that Gloria Steinem, who recently spoke at Mt. Holyoke, "gives me self-authority."

Another said of Steinem, "She's wonderful. She gives me the right to be who I want to be. . . she's very empowering."

I am glad that you were inspired by a powerful feminist, but please listen to yourselves! How can somebody "give" you self-authority? How can somebody "give" you the right to be who you are?

Clearly you have missed a vital part of Steinem's message about self-esteem, which is that it comes from within. By putting yourselves in a receiving position you are still not empowering yourselves as women.

Question the military's existence

Many editorials, both pro and con, have been printed in the Collegian concerning gays in the military. Yet none of them posit the fundamental argument as to the existence of our truculent and intrusive military in the first place. Its malevolent entrenchment is considered a given, and the only debate is whether gays should or should not be allowed access. This unspoken premise paints a disheartening picture of denial and acquiescence.

Albert Szent Gyorgi, Nobel Prize-winning biologist, succinctly stated, "One of the main biological functions of an army, as that of a cancer cell, is that it has to grow and grow, even if growth is not needed. It has to be kept occupied, so it creates incidents, pulling its country into wars and doubtful ventures.

"Armies are a curse on mankind, a threat to peace, a threat to our very existence, a blot on the face of human culture and intelligence. Armies, by definition, are the instruments of organized killing. Who will defend us against defense departments?"

ban town was a perfect example of the need for an understanding and discussion of gay issues within the classroom.

Bosselaer said she tries to forget the isolating, heterosexist high school experience she shares with many other GLB individuals.

"I had it so ingrained in my head that it [being gay, lesbian or bisexual] was evil," Bosselaers said. "It was something that was not talked about. It was never mentioned unless it was in a negative way."

Bosselaers remembers the rumors lined with hate which circulated throughout the school about two women students. Whispers and snickers labeled them as "disgusting" lesbians.

"There was a rumor that there was this lesbian couple, and people would say,'Oh, it's so gross. Oh, isn't that disgusting.'"

As the commission has shown, Bosselaers' experience is not an isolated incident. During hearings held last year, gay students were given an opportunity to speak.

Sharing their stories with commission members, they revealed the homophobic harassment and feeling of isolation they endured during school hours, Aucion wrote.

According to Aucion, a survey of almost 400 Lincoln-Sudbury high school students by the commission last year indicated a disturbing amount of homophobia throughout the classrooms and hallways of Massachusetts schools.

Interviews revealed that 97 percent of students have heard anti-gay comments while in school, and that 60 percent would be afraid if other students "thought they were gay," according to Aucion.

"I think it's important for students to learn about all history and I think gay civil rights and gay culture are a part of this country's history," Allison Ritter, a University undergraduate said in support of the commission's recommendations.

Positive responses like Ritters were common in interviews with UMass students about the commission's suggestions.

Even Kevin Carroll, a conservative undergraduate ROTC student who does not think the ban on gays in the military should be lifted, conceded that it was important to discuss GLB issues within the classroom.

"I don't have anything against anybody," Carroll said. "The gay community should be recognized."

However, while praising the commission's recommendations, students also said there might be problems if the suggestions were poorly implemented.

Expressing concern that students may feel too consumed with peer pressure to use the resources available, Wendy Beck said, "As long as they do it well that's great. As long as they keep jokes about it under control."

"If they're going to have stuff in the library, it should be accessible without everyone knowing your identity," Ritter added.

The commission's proposal, Aucion indicated, has been sent by Weld to State Education Commissioner Robert Antonucci, who will help communities voluntarily make the recommended transitions.

CHANCELLOR'S AWARDS FOR MULTICULTURALISM

A Certificate of Appreciation and three $1,000 awards will be presented each Spring at a special event in celebration of contributions toward a diverse, multicultural campus. One award each will be presented to a student (graduate or undergraduate), a staff member, and a faculty member of the University of Massachusetts at Amherst. Faculty members are invited to use their award for research or scholarships.

Criteria will be based upon significant contributions the individual has made toward a multicultural campus, with special attention paid to individuals whose efforts go far beyond the expectations of their positions. Specific reasons or examples in support of each nomination should be submitted with the nomination (i.e., resumé, vitae, other pertinent information regarding the nominee's current position on campus).

Written nominations should be submitted by Friday, April 2, 1993 to: Chancellor's Award for Multiculturalism, c/o "Frederick Tillis, 129 Herter Hall. For further information, contact Julie Lansner at

Ride on a cerebral safari of grunge space rock

By LISA CURTIS
Collegian Staff

This weekend, eject yourself onto a higher plane of music — space rock. The grunge space rock band, Architectural Metaphor, will play Saturday at the Montague Book Mill.

ArcMet has played several times at UMass, at Hampden Theater, Butterfield's Fall Festival and The Spring Fling in Central.

ArcMet's upcoming release, Odysseum Galacti, is an incredible medley of sounds, taking the listener on an unbelievable cerebral safari: tinkling bells, whistling winds, animal sounds. Animal sounds?

"Oh, that's Dave Gorrill, who works with the electronics," says Debbie Young, drummer and vocalist for the band. "He was the animal curator at The Museum of Science, and he makes those sounds vocally."

The other members of the eight-year-old ArcMet include Bill Buitenhuys and Chris Green on guitar and Paul Eggleston on synthesizer.

It was Eggleston who came up with the name of the band, says Young. She says it pertains to the way ArcMet composes their tracks through jam sessions that eventually gel into songs. "Our music is constantly improvisational. It turns into something real eventually, like architecture. It's sort of a psychedelic process," says Young.

ArcMet's "full headphone sound effect freakout cover version" of Hawkwind's 1972 classic, "Sonic Attack," won the enthusiastic approval of the members of Hawkwind, who they opened for in 1990. "Those members of Hawkwind have been around since 1969, and they asked us 'how do you do that?'" says Young. "We couldn't believe they liked it so much, and they were at a loss for how we made some of our sounds.

COURTESY ARCHITECTURAL METAPHOR

Young, an English major at UMass, provides the vocal cornerstone of the eerie backdrop of sounds on their demo. She likens ArcMet's sound to Tangerine Dream and early Pink Floyd. ArcMet uses synthesizers with "knobs and analogues" which are intrinsic to their unique sound in the 90s, says Young. "Paul [Eggleston] is a believer in that. It gives us a really unique sound. That's the difference between us and other synthesizer bands."

ArcMet has sent this demo tape to approximately 50 alternative record labels, says Young. Since other bands similar to ArcMet have been signed (Spirtualized, Spectrum), Young is optimistic about her band's future.

"We understand we're not a commercial band, but we do it because it's the only thing our heart is into," says Young. And yet, ArcMet has headlined at The Channel in Boston and The Wetlands in New York City.

To aid you on your journey to escape from the mental pressures of mid-terms, Young says that in addition to their music, "There will be a fog machine and a film show depicting pictures of nebula and dunes eroding." The images compliment their tribal rhythms. "I don't play drums in a really rigid way," says Young. "We have a psychic connection. The rhythms happen spontaneously every second, rather than becoming a predictable rock beat.

"You will dance in your mind," says Young.

Remember, you are being "officially" warned to "bring your gravity suits" to this space rock show Saturday, March 6 gig at the Montague Book Mill. The show begins at 8:30 p.m. Admission is $4.

For Our Children: The Concert
Various Artists
Disney

Just imagine Los Angeles' Universal Ampitheater packed. Why, you ask? Because a whole A-list of stars and musicians had come together to raise money for The Pediatric AIDS Foundation. It was last September when For Our Children: The Concert was recorded live. The concert was only a third of the three-pronged benefit that included a simultaneous broadcast and a home video.

The stars include Paula Abdul, Michael Bolton, Celion Dion, Shanice, Salt-N-Pepa, Bobby McFerrin, Patti Labelle and many more. The star-studded event included Jason Priestly, Kadeem Hardison, Miam Bialik, and Mary Kate and Ashley Olson introducing the musical acts. All artist and publishing royalties have been waived for the project.

Last month Walt Disney Records released For Our Children: The Concert, which is the follow-up album to 1991's For Our Children, which raised $3 million to benefit The Pediatric AIDS Foundation. The PAF is a non-profit organization confronting problems unique to children infected with HIV.

The LP includes new tunes to our favorite childhood songs. Take Paula Abdul's rendition of "Zip-A-Dee-Doo-Dah" and a sweet version of "You Are My Sunshine" sung remarkably by Michael Bolton. From Shanice's version of "Mockingbird" to Salt-N-Pepa's rapped-out "This Old Man."

These songs, as well as Celion Dion's "Beauty and the Beast," Bobby McFerrins bizarre mumbles of "Wizard of Oz Medley," Kriss Kross' "Crossed out Version of The Nursery Rhyme" relenquish the songs of our childhood days and add a new 90s musical touch to make them more appealing to adults to listen to. No matter what the words may be "I am a Pizza" to "Zip - A-Dee-Doo-Dah Zip-E-A" you'll find yourself singing along. And if it can make you feel happy, just think the good this disc is going to do for the children.

COURTESY WALT DISNEY RECORDS
Singer Paula Abdul and children perform "Zip-A-Dee-Doo-Dah" from the "For Our Children: The Concert" video and CD to benefit the Pediatric AIDS Foundation.

Michael Eisner, Disney chairman and chief executive officer, who is also one of PAF's Advisory Board members, said, "The work of the Pediatric AIDS Foundation is inspirational. I'm very proud that three Disney divisions have banded together in support of such a worthwhile and important project. We are proud to continue our support of PAF and hope that For Our Children: The Concert will exceed the legacy of For Our Children."

PAF co-founder Elizabeth Glaser, whose autobiographical book "In The Absence of Angels" tells the story of her family's battle with HIV and AIDS and how she started the PAF commented, "The Pediatric Foundation and I want to thank everyone who has helped us and let them know that hundreds and thousands of families around the world are given hope when they know others care."

"Through research we hope to save lives; through education we can provide support and compassion to families in need," she said.

For Our Children: The Concert is a disc that will make a great addition to anyone's collection. The album gives us entertainment, but at the same time it is giving hope for the children.

Stereolab 'shoegazes' through Switched On

By BRIAN BABINEAU
Collegian Correspondent

Switched On Stereolab
Too Pure Records

As alternative music has grown to encompass more than just miserable Englishmen with silly hair, so have the names assigned to categorize the different styles of alternative music. Everything from "grunge" to "industrial" to "techno" is used to describe the multitude of sounds that make up music on the cutting edge.

The very best alternative bands manage to take the particular category they are assigned to and then change it, bend it and make it their own. This is the case with Britain's latest independent label export, Stereolab.

The category of modern rock that these Brits belong to is called the "shoegazers." This refers to a musical style that relies on a slow, droning guitar sound and vocals that take a back seat to the music. This sound can be sometimes repetitious and a bit boring. The bands are called "shoegazers" because of their tendency, while playing live, to stare, stock still, at their shoes (sounds like one raucous live show...)

However, on their debut album Switched On, Stereolab manages to be anything but monotonous and boring, and combine some of the more successful elements of their fellow "gazer" bands, while avoiding the pitfalls of those bands that make them less exciting.

Stereolab's music matches the beauty of a band like Slowdive without being so boring and equals the inventiveness of My Bloody Valentine without making your ears bleed with distortion.

The album's first song "Super-electric," opens with an unusual electronic gurgle that marks one of the unique elements of this band - the use of a 1960's Moog keyboard. This precursor to the synthesizer produces beeps, whistles and whirs throughout the album, complementing Stereolab's shimmering guitar chords perfectly.

Songs like "Au Grand Jour" and "Contact" are pop masterpieces. The pulsing guitars strum from verse to chorus almost unconsciously, and lead singer Seaya Sadier's voice is beautiful, if not somewhat laid back. At times she even recalls Michelle Phillips of the Mama's and the Papa's, especially when she harmonizes with backup singer Gina Morris.

"High Expectations" recalls the Velvet Underground and Nico, as Sadier coolly sings to a jilted lover, "I used to love you, but now I don't, I don't I'm sorry/Do you want to be the offshoot of delusion?" That track is followed by "The Light that Will Cease to Fail," a song epic in sound and beauty.

Stereolab is leading the independent music movement in England, and Switched On is a perfect example why.

They have taken the musical "shoegazing" style that some boring bands, like Ride and Chapterhouse, haven't quite mastered and made it their own. Now if only they would stop staring at their sneakers...

Get hooked with Trout Fishing In America

Texas band blends comedy, rock, blues and reggae into an irresistible mix

By LISA CURTIS
Collegian Staff

Hailing from Houston, Texas, Trout Fishing in America weaves spontaneous humor and a variety of music including rhythm and blues, reggae, classic rock, originals and children's music to produce an incredible live set.

Trout is a 14-year-old duo comprised of Keith Grimwood and Ezra Idlet. The two took the name of their band from a Richard Brautigan novel written in the mid 1960s.

Grimwood, "standing a solid 5 feet and a half inches tall on a humid day," plays the string bass, electric bass guitar and provides the grittier vocals for Trout.

Idlet, a dangerous 6 feet 9 inches tall, plays acoustic guitar and "sings the songs that Keith doesn't." As the Springfield, Montana News Leader has said, "Trout Fishing in America. . . what might have happened if Paul Simon decided to play with Randy Newman."

Grimwood graduated from college with a music degree and spent two years performing with the Houston Symphony, while Idlet dropped out of college "where he was majoring in basketball."

Their latest album, Over the Limit, has better lines than Eddie Murphy's early stand-up — only more rhyme and zero profanity. "Dead Egyptian Blues" commiserates with the plight of King Tut, "Oh Mr. Tut, just wait and see/Another few thousand years they're gonna dig up me/ And I'll have all my little treasures near at hand/ A CD of Sergeant Pepper's Lonely Hearts Club Band/ A little dried up Mauai-Wowie crumbled in a bong/A letter from my honey saying, "Love you kid, so long."

Describing this band as being eclectic would be an understatement. "Sing It One More Time Like That" is reggae, "Dead Egyptian Blues" sounds bluesy in the tradition of Van Halen's cover of "Ice Cream Man," and "Dragons in the Sky" is reminiscent of Cat Stevens.

But this comedic duo doesn't do it alone on the album. The "additional musicians" include Carl Finch (accordion), Mitch Manne (drums, percussion), Steve Baker (lapsteed), Rusty Burns (second guitar), Gale Hess (violin) and Terence Slemmons (lead guitar).

With varied instruments, humor and height, Trout Fishing in America promises to be a phenomenal live show.

Trout Fishing in America returns to the Iron Horse in Northampton Sunday, March 7. The Billys, from Ashville, North Carolina will open the show.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Pay more attention to your manners and appearance. A direct approach brings the best result when talking with an authority figure. At home, avoid bringing up subjects that could cause fireworks.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Your worries about an older person's health may be unfounded. Check test results. Your ability to cope with difficulties is very impressive to a family member.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): This is not a good time to change jobs. Be orderly about financial matters. Reinvest any profits from a sale of stock back into the business. Be more realistic about a personal relationship.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Other people's mistakes may cause delays. A business sideline or hobby could yield extra income. A reorganization at work could put you in a management position.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): A longtime relationship will be put to the test this weekend. Suppress an urge to be lazy. Limit your shopping to the bare necessities.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Handle business affairs with greater diplomacy. Excessive haste could slow you down in the long run. Be supportive; show your mate that you really do care.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Do not be shy about promoting your personal interests today. A phone call or meeting gives you a chance to put your best foot forward. Travel also looks promising.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): It is time to take the initiative in career matters. Issues affecting your long-term financial security demand top priority. Speak out if you see a chance to right a wrong.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 12): Beneficial trends make this a great day to clear up a backlog of work. Stop procrastinating and dig in! Domestic and financial problems prove easy to solve.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Someone could tell you about an out-of-the-way place to find great bargains. You might want to check it out this weekend. Do not leave travel details to chance.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): A faltering relationship could get a new lease on life. The outlook is good for your personal plans. Avoid hassles over money with loved ones and friends. Pay your own way.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): A lively influence boosts yesterday's splendid developments; you get more mileage out of a successful project. A relative makes a big huge cake. Chow.

Women's gym heads south to Georgia Invite

By ARTHUR STAPLETON
Collegian Staff

For the University of Massachusetts women's gymnastics team, the road to respectability goes through Georgia.

Saturday, at 7 p.m., the Minutewomen will be one of four teams in the Bulldog Invitational, a quad-meet held at the University of Georgia. The host Georgia Bulldogs are currently ranked second in the nation, with only the University of Utah keeping them from the top spot.

Georgia is extremely tough to beat, and they are coming off a road win at No. 3 Alabama, 196.75-195.90.

Penn State University, ranked 12th in the country, has the top team in the Northeast region. The Minutewomen, currently fifth in the Northeast, find themselves chasing the Lady Lions.

West Virginia University, the favorite to win the Atlantic 10 Championships according to UMass head coach Alfie Mitchell, is ranked 21st in the country. Senior co-captain Jana Perry leads the Mountaineers, as she has been the most consistent performer. Perry has an average in the all-around this season of 37.85.

UMass faced the Mountaineers in a tri-meet earlier in the season, along with Towson State. Mitchell's team fell to WVU, 186.25-183.10.

The Minutewomen are hurting because their top two all-arounders, junior Margaret Furtado and senior Tammy Marshall, are still nursing injuries suffered in the previous two meets. In the last meet against the Wildcats, a UMass gymnast didn't win the all-around for the first time all season. Marshall is near 100 percent after only competing in one event, the beam, against New Hampshire.

On the other hand, Furtado, who is recovering from a sprained ankle which kept her from completing two events last time out, has worked out sparingly this week, and whether she will compete will be a "meet-time decision," Mitchell said.

Mitchell said his team will be concentrating more on its performance instead of worrying about winning the meet.

"The main thing is concentrating on what we can do so we can come away with a really good score," said Mitchell. "In order to win, we will have to hit 100 percent, and they will have to have a disaster.

"In basketball, anything can happen on a given day. UMass can go in and beat the No. 1 team in the country. In gymnastics, it is so individualized, what one person does really doesn't have an adverse effect on the overall team if it stays focused."

Men's gym goes for fifth straight N.E. title

By ANDREW BRYCE
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's gymnastics team will be participating in the New England Open this weekend here at UMass. The meet is on Sunday at Boyden Gym, and begins at 1 p.m.

The Minutemen will be competing against Dartmouth University, the University of Vermont, Southern Connecticut University, Springfield College and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

The Minutemen are striving for their fifth consecutive New England Open championship. Head coach Roy Johnson is confident that his team can do it.

"Springfield College and Southern Connecticut can give us a run for our money, but we are favored to win," Johnson said.

"Springfield College is going to be our biggest competitor for winning the meet," junior standout Jason Braud said. "It should be another close meet between us and Springfield."

Senior captain Steve Christensen is ranked first in the East and third in the nation in the pommel horse. He is nationally ranked behind 1992 Olympian John Roethlisberger of the University of Minnesota and Che Bowers of the University of Nebraska. His national ranking is up two places from last week.

Christensen broke his pommel horse record last weekend against Syracuse when he scored a 9.80. His current average for this event at this point in the season is 9.73.

"The key events are the pommel horse and the high bar. We should be able to win the vault, the floor exercises, the rings and the parallel bars by a lot," Johnson said.

Braud said he is confident for Sunday's meet. He said he feels that if he is in peak form, he can win the floor, vault and rings, and place in the parallel bars.

Another goal for Braud is the school record for the floor exercise, which he tied last week with a 9.70.

Johnson said he feels that his team can continue to improve, something UMass has been doing each meet. The Minutemen have peaked at a score of 255 points.

"We'd like to break into the high 250's," he said. "If we can have a real good day on pommel and high bar, we can score 260."

Minutemen finish on a high note, 61-43

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

If the University of Massachusetts basketball team was in a slump during the last few games, it is officially over, courtesy of a 61-43 victory over St. Joseph's.

Massachusetts (20-6, 11-3 in the Atlantic 10) capped its regular season in impressive fashion, dominating the A-10's second-place team in every phase of the game.

"I'm so happy," UMass coach John Calipari said. "We're going to the NCAA tournament. Do you know how many teams, their seasons are over right now?"

The Minutemen blew open the game in the second half with a ten-minute, 19-0 run, which may have been UMass' finest played stretch of basketball of the season.

With the score 31-28, UMass forward Lou Roe (12 points, five rebounds) slashed through the lane and buried an 8-footer. Guard Derek Kellogg (6 points, 6 assists) canned a three-pointer and then Roe scored in the paint, was fouled, and converted the three-point play.

Following a St. Joe's time out, Kellogg lofted up a perfect alley-oop, which Roe thundered down, bringing the 9,493 in attendance to their feet. Roe later slammed, with authority, another alley-oop from Kellogg.

"I've been looking for that play all year, but Derek has been a little timid to throw it," Roe said. "I'd like to see that play done more often. I kind of liked it."

Following Roe's jam, Harper Williams (11 points, 10 rebounds) stole the ball on the defensive end for the second time in the game and dribbled the ball up the court. In alone, Williams brought the ball up with his left, switched hands at rim level and delivered a monster dunk with his right hand.

The next time down the court, Kellogg drained another trifecta, followed by a Jerome Malloy (11 points, 10 rebounds) baseline jumper and a Tony Barbee (9 points, 5 boards) post-up play, which extended the Minutemen's lead to 50-28 with only 5:56 remaining.

Hawk coach John Griffin was forced to call his third time out of the run, before Kevin Connor's 6-footer ended the streak.

UMass, which had lost two of its last three games, was able to run the game out and secure its third straight 20-win season.

The Hawks (17-9, 8-6), who enter the A-10 tournament as the No. 2 seed, shot an abysmal 22 percent in the second half (29 percent for the game). UMass shot 43 percent from the field.

"I'm disappointed in the way we played tonight," Griffin said. "The ball just didn't go in the basket for us, but you have to credit UMass defense for that."

Malloy said, "If we play with the intensity we did tonight, no one is going to beat us in the A-10 tournament."

Hidden behind the big plays was the performance of Kellogg, who logged 36 minutes without committing a turnover and shut down the Hawks top gun, Bernard Blunt. Blunt managed to shoot only 3-15 from the field and ended the night with 10 points, far below his 18.2 point a game average.

In a well-played, defensive first half, UMass pounded its way out to a 24-21 advantage. The highlight of the half came with only 17 seconds remaining when Barbee drove the left flank and delivered a soaring, one-handed dunk.

"I think Tony's was the best dunk of the night," Williams said. "I didn't know he could get up like that."

Barbee disagreed saying, "Lou's dunks were better."

Either way, the sullen atmosphere prevalent in the UMass locker room the past few weeks was finally gone, as was any talk of a slump.

"We needed this," Roe said. "This is a big confidence booster for us. We're confident again going into the A-10s."

JOSH REYNOLDS / COLLEGIAN

Harper Williams, shown here with his monstrous first-half dunk, recorded a double-double as UMass defeated St. Joseph's 61-43.

Player of the Game

Derek Kellogg, 6-3 So. Guard

Kellogg only scored six points, but he did much more than score. He dished out six assists with no turnovers, played 37 minutes in Mike Williams' absence, and played suffocating defense in holding Rap Curry and Bernard Blunt to a combined 3-for-25 from the floor.

Why UMass won

UMass was only up 29-28 early in the second half, but a 21-0 run turned the lights out on St. Joe's. The Minutemen held the Hawks to 28 percent shooting and forced 12 turnovers. UMass shut down the St. Joe's potent guards and didn't get in foul trouble. Harper Williams and Jerome Malloy each recorded double-doubles, and Lou Roe went ballistic in the second half.

UMass' next opponent

The Minutemen play St. Bonaventure for the second time in seven days in the first round of the Atlantic 10 Tournament. UMass swept the season series against the hapless Bonnies, winning January 31 in Olean, New York by a 93-78 as Lou Roe had 21 points. On Monday, UMass won by a 82-62 count, with Harper Williams leading the way with 25 points. A last-place seed has never defeated the first-place seed in the history of the Atlantic 10 Tournament.

Politics to blame for loss of Upward Bound's grant

By TRACY MONAHAN
Collegian Staff

A recent report studying the reasons behind the loss of federal funding for the Upward Bound program has shown that Washington politics are more to blame than a poorly written application.

The report was researched by Dr. Elaine H. Anderson, an organizational development consultant from Westfield. Chancellor Richard O'Brien hired Anderson after he promised last fall to use an outside source in the investigation of why funding was lost.

"I promised to use an outside investigator in October," O'Brien said. "It added to the credibility of the analysis."

Anderson's report concluded that the grant application was competitive and stood a reasonable chance of securing federal assistance.

She concluded that the 1991 federal peer reviewers seemed more critical. Other institutions, including UCLA, were also denied funding, according to the report.

"It shows that the problem was as much in the Bush administration as it was in the campus administration," O'Brien said.

The Upward Bound program has been in existence since 1966, until it was denied funding last fall. The program provided academic, social and counseling support to high school age students from Western Massachusetts who were at risk of dropout and school failure.

The loss of the program particularly affected first-generation, low-income and minority students. These students used Upward Bound as an avenue towards educational opportunity, the report said.

The report faulted Upward Bound for poor record keeping, but stated that the application reflected a 25-year history of successful programming. Anderson said she saw no reason for the format of the application to be significantly altered.

"I am pleased that it [the report] demonstrated that there where no deliberate actions on the part of those who put the proposal together," O'Brien said.

"I am satisfied and pleased to hear that Dr. Anderson did not find blame to be placed," Dean of Students Joanne Vanin said.

Anderson said she believed the report helped to open a dialogue. She said that the report showed the contributions made by Chancellor O'Brien to multiculturalism, yet those interviewed had different ideas on the extent of the changes.

"The report was a catalyst to get people to look at things differently," Anderson said.

She said she believes it is a great opportunity to bring a new program up to today's standards, with new guidelines and needs.

A new program has been implemented by Chancellor O'Brien to replace Upward Bound. It will be under the direction of Nicholas C. McBride, a professor of journalism at the University.

The program will be temporarily funded by the University, with one million dollars to be spread over three years. At that time, the University can again apply for federal funding.

The new program will have three parts. There will be an afterschool tutoring program for junior and senior high school students who could benefit from academic support. This has already been implemented at the Amherst Regional High School and will eventually expand to include Northampton and other area high schools.

The high schools will select participants, and the tutoring will be provided by University undergraduates supervised by graduate students.

There will also be a summer program, beginning this year. Students will be chosen from those already participating in the outreach programs.

The final part will be a five-year program of college study, slated to begin this fall. Still in the planning stages, it will be a bachelor's degree program and includes an extra year for academic development.

Ten to 20 students are expected to be in the first class. Several of the University's minority support programs will assist the Admission's office in selecting participants.

"We are pressing ahead with a new version of Upward Bound," O'Brien said. "This encourages us to go forward."

SGA canidates tackle the issues, live on UVC

By ALYSSA M. OWENS

A student government candidates' debate last night focused on issues of battling tuition increases and enhancing student empowerment, before accusations of failure to recognize multiculturalism as a key issue were brought forth by the audience.

Participating in the debate were student trustee candidates Kevin Jourdain, Jeff Turco and Al Lizana, and student government presidential candidate David Nuñez. Presidential candidate Jennifer Fazzi was unable to attend due to a family emergency.

The candidates were questioned by representatives from WMUA, the Union Video Center and the Collegian, as well as audience members during the debate, which was broadcast live on UVC.

Student trustee candidates said rising tuition rates are a major issue which affects many students on campus.

"I would fight tuition increases with every fiber of my body," Jourdain said.

Lizana, who also said he would oppose them, said, "What are the cons of not raising tuition? Are they worth losing students?"

Turco said he would have to review the University's financial status before op-

Flood damages FAC

Officials say clean-up to be minimal

The costs for last weekend's flood in the Fine Arts Center has been estimated at $24,000 for damages and clean-up, according to University officials.

The majority of the money, approximately $20,000, represents the value of the labor used to clean the water that entered parts of the building after a heating pipe froze, according to University spokesperson Karin Sherbin.

Damage to the building was minimal, and mostly involved soaked floor and ceiling tiles and record sleeves from albums in the music library that had to dry out, officials said.

Classes were resumed at Bezanson Hall last Thursday and a recital took place there Saturday, after the hall had been closed most of the week because of wet carpeting and a musty odor, Sherbin said.

There are two pianos in Bezanson Hall, with one suffering no damage and another suffering minimal damage. Although a final estimate is as yet unavailable, it has been determined that the organ in Bezanson will cost at least several thousand dollars to repair, Sherbin said. Sherbin added that the organ is rarely used and the damage will not affect classes or recitals.

Nuñez, Lizana advocate multicultural campus

The student government president should be someone willing to work with people of all different backgrounds and orientations, said David Nuñez, a candidate for student government president.

"We must keep multiculturalism on the forefront on this campus," Nuñez said. "I believe I could provide the impetus for the unification of this campus."

Nuñez, a sophomore history major, said if elected he would strive for both greater diversity and numbers in student government representation.

Coalition building should be a major goal for student government, said Al Lizana, a student trustee candidate.

"We all have some of the same goals, regardless of our religious preference, sexual preference, cultural background or race," Lizana said. "We should all work together."

"A lot of people think the trustee just deals with financial aid and tuition increases, but I think it all comes down to how you feel about people," Lizana said. "As student trustee, I would help set the tone for an inclusive SGA."

ting people to know what the SGA is," said Nuñez.

Nuñez said he would also advocate informational exchanges through student forums about the SGA, going door-to-door in residence halls and advertising through WMUA, the Union Video Center, the Collegian and mass mailings.

Nuñez said he supports revision of University Health Services.

"Health Services needs total revision," Nuñez said. "The wait has to be made shorter and better privacy is needed."

Nuñez added that he believes the $10 fee for service after 9 p.m. and the ambulance fee should be eliminated.

Nuñez also said he would like to be on the Health Services review board to investigate the validity of the student health fee.

Last semester Nuñez became a senator and chairperson of the Third World Caucus, which has about 20 appointed seats in the SGA.

Nuñez is a member of the Talented Minority Scholarship Committee and has worked as a negotiator for the Latin American Cultural Center, for which he helped obtain better space, increased funding and computer equipment, he said.

Nuñez said one of his his major goals is the reorganization of Student Activities Trust Fund.

"I would like to set terms as to how the SATF is used — how much is the limit that Registered Student Organizations can receive and how to achieve more equality for RSOs," Nuñez said.

"I'd like to work with the finance and budget committees in making a printed list of all sources of funding for RSOs," Nuñez said. "Area governments, Housing Services, and the Fine Arts Center could be used as alternative sources of funding."

Nuñez said he supports both University Legal Services' efforts to regain litigation rights and the passage of the SGA constitution.

"If we can get the constitution ratified, we'll be recognized as a student governemnt under state law," Nuñez said. "It would give us the legal lever to take action if things aren't done in the right way."

Nuñez said better relations between students and the University administration are needed.

"I believe students are frustrated," Nuñez said. "They don't like what the administration is doing. I would ask them to speak up."

Nuñez said he wants all students to unite and share their concerns and ideas for the future.

"17,000 heads are better than one," Nuñez said.

Prof. details collapse of communism

By MARIE KALLINEY
Collegian Correspondent

The past three or four years have brought the collapse of communism and the end of the Cold War, said UMass Professor Charles Mark during his lecture last Thursday night.

Mark detailed the recent economic and social changes that have taken place in Eastern Europe. His focus was on the current uprisings in Czechoslovakia and the effects they will have on the rest of Eastern Europe, including Poland, Hungary, and Yugoslavia.

"Communism was idealized, an almost secular religion. But ultimately the idealism faded," Mark said.

One of the most important reasons for the fall of communism was the people living in those areas. They did not want to live under that kind of "strict" government rule. "The common people did not see these changes coming, and when it came, they could not believe it," said Mark.

Mark also said that the changes in Czechoslovakia occurred so rapidly and will probably last because the peoples' protests were through nonviolent means. With no military control, there is more chance for success than if the people had used violent force, according to Mark.

Mark told the audience that the protest was without much thought and consideration for the future. The protesters had no leader, and no one knew who the new leader would be.

Mark lectured on the contrasting methods of protest and change throughout Eastern Europe. "In contrast to Yugoslavia, the break up of the Czechs and the Slavics into two separate entities was very rapid."

Mark compared the results of the revolutions in the Soviet Union and Czechoslovakia. "When we look at the results of the fall of the Iron Curtain, we see two drastically different ways of protest: one was nonviolence and the other was the extreme violence that occurred in the Soviet Union," said Mark.

Mark, born and raised in Czechoslovakia, went abroad to New Zealand in 1950. In 1954, he permanently settled in the United States and he now teaches in the Slavic Department at The University of Massachusetts.

Hotel CEO speaks at UMass

By JASON GEORGE
Collegian Staff

Jonathan Tisch, the Chief Executive Officer of the Loews Hotel chain, will bring his philosophy on certain aspects of the leisure services industry to the University of Massachusetts this afternoon.

Tisch will speak at 1:25 p.m. at Bowker Auditorium, according to junior hotel restaurant and travel administration major Mitch Lewis, who helped organize Tisch's visit to the university.

Lewis said Tisch's philosophy for Loews emphasizes catering to the needs of clients.

"[Tisch] compares hotels to Hollywood industry — he's almost like a showman out on the floor," Lewis said. "He puts a big play on people."

Tisch's approach to the hotel industry contrasts with what students are often taught at this and other universities, Lewis said, where academic programs often focus on more technical aspects of the industry and do not deal so much in things such as hotel etiquette.

Lewis said he has worked for a Loews Hotel in Los Angeles for the past two summers, working two summers ago at a health club in the hotel, and for a second summer in the Executive Business Center assigned to hospitality for groups of movie executives staying at Loews.

Lewis said Tisch's approach to the hotel industry is different from other major hotel chains.

"Loews didn't expand like other hotel chains during the 1980's," Lewis said, noting that most of the Loews Hotels are located in the United States. There are only two Loews Hotels outside of the United States — one in Monte Carlo and one in Canada.

Lewis, however, said Loews is beginning to expand in some places like Los Angeles and "taking business from places like Hilton."

In addition to his extensive work in the hotel industry, Tisch has been active in a number of different facets of charity work, including AIDS research. He also helped organize this year's Grammy awards.

Film documents ACT-UP activism

By ADAM RATTINER
Collegian Staff

The scene is Shea Stadium, the home of the New York Mets baseball team. Dwight Gooden winds up to throw a pitch. Will Clark of the San Fransisco Giants hits the ball into foul territory. The television cameras follow the ball to see where it lands and pans to a surprising sight.

There is a large sign being held up by many people filling row after row of seats which reads "SAFE SEX. NO GLOVE, NO LOVE."

This is just another act that the AIDS activist group ACT UP did to bring attention to the fact that people with AIDS in America are being neglected.

Voices From The Front, the first feature-length documentary to comprehensively cover the AIDS activist movement in America was shown in Thompson Hall this Thursday and was hosted by Norman Cowie, the Five College Professor of Film and Video.

Cowie said the film was originally made for an underground audience in 1991, but it worked its way up, and is to be shown on HBO this coming October.

Other interesting scenarios in the AIDS activist film, Voices From the Front, included ACT UP blocking the opening of the New York Stock Exchange for five minutes to protest investment in the drug AZT and women carrying mattresses in the streets to symbolize the lack of beds for women in hospitals.

ACT UP has also launched balloons in the Metropolitan Opera House with a sign attached to them reading "Fight AIDS, Not War." Dan Rather has been interrupted by AIDS activists on the CBS Evening News, and the National Institutes of Health and the FDA has been stormed by loud and angry activists.

Almost all the people featured in the documentary had AIDS, from the narrators to the patients. By the time the movie was made, many of the dedications were to people that were in the movie.

The people with AIDS had a great deal to say and they said it very loudly. According to the documentary, the movie did not just portray the stereotype of a person with AIDS, which is a White male breathing his last breath.

The documentary tried instead to cover much of the New York City AIDS community. Everyone protesting or speaking in the film seemed to have this lively aura around them, as if they expected to die sooner than they planned.

The documentary portrayed ACT UP, not as a self-pitying movement, but as an active subculture that is fighting for its rights and its life. The movie was based around these activists in New York City and their activity around the country.

student advisory board to discuss issues at the Board of Trustees level, such as tuition increases, financial aid reform and reformation of University services.

"I'd also like to network with the graduate students more, to discuss common goals," Lizana said. "And I'm interested in the renegotiation of GEO's contract and will advocate that."

Lizana said alternatives to raising tuition at the University should be sought.

"I'll research other funding sources for the University and the reshuffling of funds, instead of raising tuition," Lizana said.

Lizana said he looks forward to talking with state legislators about how President Clinton's education proposals will benefit students.

Lizana is a junior Social Thought and Political Economy major.

He is former vice president of Afrik-Am and once worked as an intern with University Legal Services.

Lizana is in the National Guard, vice president and a founding member of the Black Student Union, Talented Minority Scholarship Committee member, and the central staff coordinator for the University's seven multicultural centers.

Lizana worked as a legislative aid to state Rep. Raymond Jordan (D-Springfield) in 1987-1988.

"I think the most important qualification for the student trustee is to know the network," Lizana said. "I've had the opportunity meet almost every university administrator and many of the Board of Trustee members."

Lizana said he has a good working relationship with President Hooker.

Lizana said he supports University Legal Services efforts to regain litigation rights. He said a group he's working with is pursuing regaining the rights through state legislators and, at the same time, petitioning the Board of Trustees with the request.

Lizana cited financial aid reform as another goal and said he will be working with Students Advocating for Financial Aid.

"In April, I will be lobbying the state and federal government in Washington D.C. to try to get more financial aid," Lizana said.

Lizana said he would work with the Board of Trustees to enhance multiculturalism on campus.

Lizana cited increased funding for multicultural organizations and events, workshops for faculty and staff to increase sensitivity to multiculturalism, and security patrols "so students feel safer" as ideas to pursue.

Jazz group makes debut at UMass

By SANDRA ROSE
Collegian Staff

The acclaimed all-female Spelman College Jazz Ensemble is at UMass tomorrow for their only performance in Western Massachusetts.

The twenty member ensemble makes their UMass debut in Bowker Auditorium at 8:00 p.m.

"The musicians and voices are so strong," said Tamara Grogen, Assistant to Associate Director of the Fine Arts Center.

According to the press release, the group is described as "a unique combination of vocalists and instrumentalists . . . these talented young women will be performing their brand of jazz that revolves around vocalists harmonizing and scatting jazz standards with an instrumental background and solos."

The group was organized in Spring of 1983 at Spelman College, a predominantly Black, female institution and the site of television's "A Different World." Their director is Joseph Jennings, a music professor at Spelman, and a composer, performing artist and director of the Life Force Jazz Ensemble.

The group provides an opportunity for college female musicians to perform, learn, and experience the American art form of Jazz, according to Director Jennings.

The Spelman College Jazz Ensemble has been performing to sell out crowds around the country. They have performed at the Atlanta Jazz Festival, National Black Arts Festival, Capital City Jazz Festival, The Civil Rights Memorial Service, and North Sea Jazz Festival in the Netherlands. Past performances have featured well-known musicians such as Wynton Marsalis and Nancy Wilson.

posing increases, but said, "This university must work to increase its enrollment."

All trustee candidates agreed there is a need for greater student empowerment at the University.

"No student trustee can empower other students without the students empowering themselves," Turco said, noting that students need to be educated about the issues affecting them.

Jourdain said, "We are a unit and must act together," citing the effort to pass the SGA's constitution and student involvement in selecting a new chancellor as steps toward student empowerment.

Lizana said, "Students pay the bills around here and they're not being provided with quality service. We must be active, with everyone involved. We must not cut off access to any group."

An earlier comment by Jourdain that "multiculturalism is a fringe issue" sparked heated questioning from the audience.

"I used the term 'fringe issue' for multiculturalism because if we don't have student empowerment, we can't have multiculturalism," Jourdain said.

Nuñez and Lizana disagreed and said multiculturalism should be one of the central issues of the University's mission.

The debate will be rebroadcast on HSCN Channel 19 today at 3 p.m. and Tuesday at 6 p.m. and on WMUA following tonight's UMass basketball game.

Editorial/Opinion

The opinions expressed on this page are those of the individual writers or cartoonists and do not necessarily reflect those of the Collegian unless otherwise noted.

Take back UMass — vote

It all starts with your vote on March 9 and 10.

This year's candidates for student government president and student trustee have one thing in common: they all say students must get involved in student government to take back the power it has lost over the years. The Massachusetts Daily Collegian agrees with them and with the SGA that students should regain control over their university and the allocation of their money.

In the past two years the Student Senate has reclaimed much of the respect and power that had been lost during years of gridlock and the crisis the body underwent in the spring of 1991. It has come closer than ever before to ratifying a new student government constitution. Some key administration personnel changes have helped tremendously, but much of the credit must go to the current Senate leadership.

But it's only a start. The same issues that faced students prior to the 1991 crisis are still with us.

Skyrocketing tuition and fees have priced the University beyond the means of those who need it most — students from poor and middle-class backgrounds.

The Legal Services Center, a student-funded organization, is still denied the right to take legal action against the University, making it almost powerless.

Policies that directly affect students are made by administrators and trustees, virtually without student input or approval.

As long as the campus remains divided and apathetic, hostile administrators and uncaring trustees will continue to bypass student voice and input. While we battle amongst ourselves for the pettiest and most foolish reasons, the administration laughs us.

If we unite behind the power of a revitalized and energetic student government, however, we can put our differences behind us and work on important issues which effect us all. It has worked before. It can work again.

The mechanisms are there. The Student Senate, area governments, the Board of Governors, house councils and faculty subcommittees all exist and are there to help bring student concerns to those in power and solve problems before lawlessness becomes the only recourse.

Even if students aren't interested in these forms of government, there is one self-empowering thing they can all do easily and painlessly — vote!

If you don't vote in the March 9 and 10 elections you are telling the University it may spend your money and treat you any way it pleases.

With this in mind, the Massachusetts Daily Collegian urges all eligible students to vote in the March 9 and 10 elections. It's your university. Take it back by voting.

Purim: past is prologue

Jennifer L.
PRESS

The racial tension on campus the past year has made a lot of people think about their beliefs and values and look toward their own ethnicity and religion for answers.

Anti-Semitism at UMass has been a problem that, like other racial and prejudiced incidents, has often been kept under wraps. The administration believes if people were aware of the anti-Semitic attacks that occur every day, the "idyllic" image they have worked so hard to create would be destroyed. What they don't realize is that anti-Semitism is nothing new, on this campus or anywhere else.

Anti-Semitism has existed since the beginning of Judaism. Jews are aware of that. But that doesn't mean they accept it or hope that one day all the hurt and anger directed at them, just because they have certain beliefs that others disagree with, will end.

People say that past is prologue and that forgetting the past is like making the same mistake all over again. That's why everyone, not just Jewish people, must remember the Holocaust. Forgetting that millions of people were tortured and murdered for no real reason means it could happen again.

The Jewish holiday of Purim, celebrated March 6, is usually considered a joyous holiday. It should be. It commemorates Esther and Mordecai's deliverance of the Jews from Persia, where the prime minister, Haman, had planned to massacre the Jewish people. We celebrate Purim, the Jewish Feast of Lots, because the Jews escaped. Jews rejoice over the fact that the plot failed but the reason behind the triumph is not forgotten. It really isn't a triumph at all. Haman's plot was just like Hitler's. Someone had so much hate for them that he wanted to wipe out their entire race. It's pathetic and sad.

The story of Esther and Mordecai's victory over Haman can be translated into the average Jew's modern day battle with anti-Semitic attacks. They had to save the Jews from Haman's hate but today there is no one to save the Jews. They must do it themselves.

This goes for any race, religion or person or group who is the target of prejudice and bigotry. The only way to end it in today's huge, impersonal and often harsh world is to begin with yourself. One way to do this is to never forget the past because if we do, we will be doomed to repeat it.

Jews will never forget Esther and Mordecai's triumph, which dates back to the 5th century B.C. It can be seen as one of the first successful attempts to rise above anti-Semitism and get rid of hate, not the people.

Purim is considered a happy time but one must never forget why the celebration is taking place. Children think of it as fun, like Halloween. They dress in costumes during the reading of the story told in the Book of Esther and shake noisemakers to drown out the mention of Haman's name. Parties usually follow. Hamantashen, a pastry shaped and named for Haman's fabled three-cornered hat, are eaten as a reminder of why there is a celebration. That's something too crucial to forget.

Purim is also a time for charity and exchanging gifts of food with friends. This year, rather than food, we should try to make a commitment instead: a commitment to try to better understand other individuals' beliefs, religion and culture. We all have to live on this campus together and put aside outside differences to get to what's real and true on the inside. That's the first step to creating the friendlier, peaceful world some people would like us to believe we already live in.

Working women unite in celebration

Felicia
COUSINS

I attended a celebration of International Working Women's Day in New York City this past weekend, and saw the REAL strength that holds communities of color together — working women.

Esperanza Mortel is a working mother, who organizes around issues concerning political prisoners and works as a social worker. Along with other women activists in the community, she decided there had to be a time that women such as herself could come together and appreciate themselves as well as be appreciated by others.

In contrast to this we have a "diverse" community such as Amherst, where "multiculturism" is thrown around as a characterization of the community. However, I have heard no mention of such an event, or its likeness. The 1993 Women's Conference did an excellent job reaching out to many people and initiated discussions around certain issues but the work should not end there.

In this community where we would like to believe we are extremely progressive, there is no effort made to recognize and appreciate the purpose of working women both in this country and in struggling nations of the Third World. Somalian born, Aisha Al-Adawiya, spoke briefly about the current situation that the United States is responsible for. "Leave Us Alone," was her demand to the U.S. military concerning the invasion of Somalia and the escalation of death, brutalization and destruction caused by the U.S.

The highlight of the conference was the award ceremony. Seventy-one-year-old politcal activist, Yuri Kochiyama was honored for her tireless work in the struggle for the liberaton of peoples of African descent. Yuri was a close friend of Malcolm X, and a member of the Republic of New Africa. She also worked with the Black Panther Party, Black Liberation Alliance and other political organizations. On the same day Yuri was also recognized at another event commemorating the Japanese-American memorial of the Internment Camps.

After meeting and speaking with Yuri, I was made more aware of the struggles of women and other oppressed people in asserting themselves in our racist, male-dominated society. Yuri has lived in a Harlem project all her life, with a predominantly Black and Latino population around her. However, this four-foot nine-inch Japanese-American woman does not clutch her pocket book as she leaves or enters her apartment, but instead has dedicated her life to the struggles of Black people. She has the energy and strength most people only dream about. I was struck with utter admiration when I realized that the passion and love she had for all the work that she has done, had nothing to do with the acknowledgment and recognition she had received both in the past and in the present.

Having witnessed some aspects of what UNITY should be all about, I have become even more appalled at the lack of it in our communities of color at this university. We have left too many people feeling marginalized and alienated. In her speech at the Women's Conference, Angela Davis stressed building alliances on political ideology and not solely on race, which is precisely what the women in the International Working Women's Conference did.

The women that I met, listened to and spoke with this weekend have struggled harder, fought with more strength and worked with more passion than imaginable in order to improve life for themselves and their community. They have not lost touch with what is still important — eradicating class differences and prejudices based on race, gender, and sexual orientation.

Some of us might be celebrating International Women's Day today, but stop and think about what it REALLY means.

Campaigners want to legally get stoned

There have been numerous editorials on legalization of marijuana. While I don't agree it should be legalized, I believe marijuana and most drug use should be more legally tolerated. Many drugs have merit in providing other views of reality and glimpses into the creative power of the mind. My aim in writing is to get those campaigning for the legalization of marijuana to be more honest.

Marijuana is a gateway to other drug use. Anyone who has smoked marijuana and gone on to other drugs knows this to be true. My other problem with the campaign is in its embracing hemp as an important cash crop. While it is accurate that marijuana has economic and medical value, I doubt those proposing legalization truly care about these issues.

For honesty's sake, I'd like to see supporters admit to wanting marijuana legalized so they legally can get stoned.

Theft of computer derails grant study

Sometime during the night of March 3 a Macintosh Quadra 700 computer (with monitor, keyboard and overhead projection panel) was stolen from the lecture preparation area in Hasbrouck Laboratory. This equipment was an essential part of a classroom response system recently installed in the physics lecture hall as part of a federal grant for educational innovation.

This theft constitutes a serious setback to a National Science Foundation grant to study the use of technology in education. By enabling students to respond individually to questions in class, this technology has the potential to modify the impersonal atmosphere of large lectures, making them seem more like small classes where students can receive almost individual attention.

The impact of this setback goes well beyond this class, or even this university. The project is national in scope: the system is also being installed at Harvard, Carnegie-Mellon, Ohio State, Stanford, Arizona State and Michigan State Universities. Of the eight sites that will eventually install the system, we were the only fully functional site other than the primary development site. All other sites will not be operational until next semester at the earliest. As the first major university exploring the pedagogic value of this technology we were in a unique position to influence the design and implementation of they system.

To all students: The perpetrators of this theft have done you serious injury, both financially and educationally. Financially because the University is "self-insured." The need to replace this equipment means there will be less money for other endeavors. Educationally because efforts to introduce a significant educational innovation have been thwarted for at least a semester.

To students in Physics 182: Obviously, this situation is beyond our control. We apologize for the disruption and will make every effort to minimize the impact of the loss on your educational experience. We know that the situation is doubly disheartening to those of you who attended 181 and have been anticipating the installation of the system for some time. We will replace the system but it is unlikely that this will be in time to salvage much of the semester. All we can do is thank you for your tolerance of the problems associated with the attempted innovation and express our regret that your sacrifices have come to naught.

To the University community: Anyone having information that would enable us to recover this system and continue our project should send that information to the appropriate authorities. Thank you.

William Gerace
Dept. of Physics and Astronomy

DEANS LIST

One of the Universities highest priorities is its commitment to provide opportunities for academic growth. I am pleased, therefore, to recognize those of you who earned Deans List status for the Fall Semester 1992.

This level of achievement - 3.5 or higher semester average with twelve or more graded credits - is attained by fewer than 20% of the undergraduate student body. Such outstanding performance is a source of pride to the faculty, staff, your student colleagues, and, of course, your parents.

Thank you for the credit you bring to the University through your achievement.

Richard D. O'Brien, Chancellor

PRESS RELEASES - To publicize your achievement, the University will be issuing a press release to your hometown newspaper and to Massachusetts resident [illegible] of-state students are required to submit a press release form at 200 Munson Hall second floor. For further information please call 545-0444

ADDITIONS OMISSIONS - The Deans List was edited and posted by the Registrar's Office by February 16, 1993. If your name does not appear after that date, including making up an incomplete, or has a lower or ungraded record after that date, and believe you now qualify for Deans List, please fill out a form available at the Information Data Bank 211 Whitmore. attach verification, and return the form to [illegible]

REMINDER: ONLY GRADED CREDITS ARE CALCULATED IN DETERMINING DEANS LIST ELIGIBILITY. PASS FAIL CREDITS ARE NOT INCLUDED.

The Deans List is prepared for publication by Student Affairs. Special Services which pays for this listing as a service to the campus community. [illegible] of the Massachusetts Daily Collegian gratefully acknowledges their assistance

Delivering the rave on PHAT with Jeff Miller

By ADAM SCOTT ROBERTS
Collegian Staff

This past weekend in Butterfield basement, Umass' first RAVE was held. Jeff Miller took time out after the RAVE to speak with the Collegian about this latest dance movement to hit the Valley.

The dj's of PHAT: (from L. to R.) JBIZ, D.J. Reeds, Jeff Miller and Matt. ARAM COMJEAN / COLLEGIAN

Adam Scott Roberts: You can start by telling me what a RAVE is.
Jeff Miller: It's a travelling night club per se that originated in Europe and in the past few years has made its mark in the States.
ASR: What kind of music is actually played at a RAVE?
JM: Techno was the first popular dance music for the RAVES... Having generally no lyrics... a lot of bass and around 180 beats per minute. Now its slowed down a little bit and it contains more lyrics than previously. Hence, the name of house or trance music emerged.
ASR: How did you get interested in it?
JM: I was always interested in the whole mysterious concept revolving around RAVES.
ASR: How did you first hear about RAVES?
JM: I just founded a flyer when I was living in Denver two years ago.
ASR: Are they different out West?
JM: They are much more commercialized with too much competition.
ASR: Do you have partners and if so, how did you all come together?
JM: Well, there are a total of four of us with equal stakes in the company. No one has more power than another. I was in the business in Denver by myself for two years. I decided to spice up this school after I transferred. I merged with Andrew, Jesse, and Matt who are all on exchange from England.
ASR: What exactly do they do?
JM: Andrew is the D.J. and an unbelievable coordinator. Jesse is a great organizer and has outstanding connections. And Matt likewise puts in more than enough effort.
ASR: Where exactly does your piece fit into the puzzle you call PHAT?
JM: Basically, I design flyers with the ideas of my partners. Also, I acquire the sound system and oversee the whole operation and make sure everything runs smoothly and to keep fellow Ravers satisfied.
ASR: What is your company called?
JM: It's titled PHAT; which stands for Pumping House And Techno. The name was created by one of my partners, Matt.
ASR: What is your goal by having RAVES in Amherst?
JM: My supreme goal for this year— if not the next, is to book 10,000 plus person capacity RAVE at the Mullins Center in May. Also I'm hoping to shut down bars and fraternity parties all together! [Smiles]
ASR: Is this realistic?
JM: Too!! [pompously].
ASR: Would you say PHAT is a temporary job per se. Like, where do you plan to take this idea?
JM: While in college this is going to be a full time hobby and after graduation I plan to open the most elite underground nightclubs in the country.
ASR: Would you like status like New York's Limelight or Los Angeles' Roxbury?
JM: The only club I respect in this country is Roxbury. Because it's so phat but not too commercialized. They have the best PR in the market easily. You have to kiss hype ass and they know where to stick their noses.
ASR: So, are you saying that you plan to go after the Hollywood scene like Roxbury does?
JM: Not necessarily. Roxbury is one in a million.
ASR: Was UMass' first RAVE the success you hoped it to be?
JM: [Eyebrows go up] We had triple the amount of people than expected. Despite the short six day promotion period beforehand, invites were printed only one week ago and that tremendous storm. People wouldn't leave the long line outside though they had no guarantee of getting in.
ASR: It's a good thing I had a VIP pass. So, what's next?
JM: A party with 800 plus people one or two weeks after Spring Break properly named Liberty II. [This past RAVE was Liberty I]
ASR:Why was it the Liberty Rave to begin with?
JM: In honor of Keith Haring and his pop-art work in general and his Statue of Liberty piece of work as well as for his outstanding achievements in the arts.
ASR: In a few words how would you best describe who Jeff Miller really is?
JM: (Takes a few minutes to think) A pure original! [laughs]
ASR: A little pompous there, Jeff.
JM: [with a child-like grimace] You have to be to keep yourself going.
ASR: I guess so. Trust me, I know!

Too Much Joy pledges their best show ever

What makes a perfect band? Is it musical ability? Presentation? Personality? Sharing a bond with their audience?

If you were to take all of these traits and then factor in; an angst ridden sense of humor, incredible sexiness and one hell of a live show — you'd end up with a band exactly like Too Much Joy.

Rolling Stone gave their newest album release, Mutiny, 3 1/2 stars out of 4 and called them, "The Clash without the sanctimonious gas." Entertainment Weekly graded them "A-". And People Magazine said, "This album is the band's best yet."

Too Much Joy will be making their second appearance this year at Pearl St. in Northampton on March 9th and it's a show that shouldn't be missed TMJ's last appearance at Pearl St. with The Mighty Lemondrops in October was such a great success that the Joy boys decided to revisit the area during their solo tour.

When asked about what kind of a show fans can expect this time out TMJ's guitarist Jay Blumenfield says, "You can expect probably the best Too Much Joy show that we've ever put on. We're sort of free from any limitations so we can play as long as we want, we

Bark like a Mad Dog

The humor dribbles in lame comedy

By JON LUPO
Collegian Staff

Imagine a romantic comedy that opens up with two of the grisliest murders you're bound to see this year. Doesn't exactly put you in the mood, does it?

Some critics who shall remain nameless (or thumbless for that matter) have been touting the rickety Mad Dog and Glory as some sort of breath of original comedy. While there are very brief flashes of "new" humor, Mad Dog and Glory isn't very funny and far from enjoyable.

It's big-name stars and big name director and producer make you think something inventive is going on, but the film's stilted, stop-and-go structure is actually annoying and not the least bit interesting.

Movie-God Martin Scorsese produced Mad Dog and James McNaughton (Henry: Portrait of A Serial Killer) helms this thin piece of comic boredom, employing the same static camerawork and style as in Henry. He vainly tries to adapt this to the romantic comedy genre and the result is a mostly plodding anti-comedy.

Robert DeNiro plays a simple, lovelorn police photographer who saves the life of a bastard mobster (Bill Murray) and Murray gives him a woman named Glory (Uma Thurman) for his "reward." DeNiro is pretty disgusted at first but, wouldn't you know it, he falls in love with her and must deal with Murray, who wants Glory back.

This kind of woman-for-sale trend has been perversely popular lately, as indicated by the loopy Honeymoon In Vegas and the upcoming Indecent Proposal. In Mad Dog, Thurman's motives aren't that clear. She's upset that's she's being traded like a baseball card but her "love" for DeNiro seems more like an excuse to be bought out of Murray's relationship.

Does this make much sense? Not really. And neither does this movie. What, exactly, is this film about? Love and money aren't that far removed? You can buy true love? Screenwriter Richard Price (The Color of Money) doesn't seem to know, and neither does anyone else.

Mad Dog's curious lack of rhythm is the big suspect flaw here. McNaughton doesn't play up any of the comedy and his laid-back exposition lets the humor dribble. The film's pedestrian comedy is so erratic and vague that I began to wonder why this movie was made in the first place.

Mad Dog has one small pleasure. It comes in the film's best sequences: the two love scenes. McNaughton's steady lens and block-like shots capture what sex really is, a funny, clumsy, passionate event. Otherwise, McNaughton brings a certain disinterested vision to the film and seems to hope the characters will pick up the slack.

The quirky characters are just that: quirks. From Murray's dim-witted henchman and DeNiro's partner to the lead roles themselves, Price has underwritten them all. Who are these people, anyway? Once again, no one seems to know.

Robert DeNiro — acting giant or not — has always been just a little too hard to take in any of his "nice" roles. His bland romance with Meryl Streep in Falling In Love was a bore, his turn as a mental patient was almost unbearably gosh-darnet in Awakenings, save a few virtuoso scenes at the end and his performance was just plain unwatchable as the illiterate man romancing teacher Jane Fonda in Stanley and Iris.

Midnight Run came the closest to a respectable hero, but in Mad Dog, he's just so normal. A little showy, but I'll give DeNiro the benefit of the doubt here. Let's just say that I wasn't amazed as I usually am with DeNiro's performances.

can try out new stuff, we can take requests and we can just have fun which is why we started this stupid band in the first place. Finally we can let loose, so we're looking forward to a night of fun and excitement.

Too Much Joy fans have been known to travel incredible distances to see them play. When the band played Pearl St. last fall people had commuted from as far away as four hours just to see them on stage for a little over sixty minutes (time constraints were a problem since TMJ weren't the headliners). But on this tour, Blumenfield says things will be different.

"It kind of depends on the crowd," said Blumenfield. "If people want us to play a long time we'll be the [expletive] Grateful Dead!"

The band's gift is that they truly seem to care about each and every performance being given. Nobody who leaves a TMJ show is ever left feeling that the band was only there to pick up a check. If the crowd is loud, they'll be louder and if the crowd is quiet they'll make sure they don't remain that way for long. It's hard to be silent when you find yourself singing and dancing with 200 other people.

With trippy original songs like "Magic," "Susquehanna Hat Co.," "Kicking" and "Clowns" coupled with classic covers like Terry Jack's "Season's in the Sun"—TMJ strives to meld grunge with pop to create a genre of music never before heard and long overdue. Let's call it "grunge-pop", works for me and it should work for you if you're a fan of garage birthed, guitar driven, kick your chair over and dance, makes-me-smile music.

So I'm going to lay a challenge out to the band to see if they're as good as their word; my three requests are; 1. "Kicking" (off of the Son of Sam I am albulm), 2."Drum Machine" (from the almost impossible to find copy of Green Eggs and Crack), and the ultimate challenge—3. A cover of the Go-Go's classic hit, "Vacation."

There you have it. The line has been drawn. Will TMJ rise to the occasion and meet the challenge or will they meekly hide away from it? Will Tim Quirk take his clothes off on stage and send teams of frenzied fans into a mass delirium? Will the stage divers make it into the safety of the pit or crash heavily into the floor?

All these questions and more will be answered live and in person by Too Much Joy, Tuesday, March 9th at Pearl St. Overwhelming Colorfast will be opening. The show is 18+. Doors open at 9:00. Tickets available at Tix Unlimited in the Student Union. $6 advance/$8 at the door.

Take Bill Murray's role as the sardonic weather man in Groundhog Day, drain the fun and underlying smirk, and you've got his performance in Mad Dog. Murray manages to steal a few scenes now and then, but the film's humor is so out there (like, out of the movie) that he seems overly conscious about every line. He doesn't have much to work with and it's a shame because I was waiting for Murray to play a clever villain. This role clearly isn't it.

If former Amherst area resident Uma Thurman keeps doing bland, anyone-could-play-this roles, she may end up like Molly Ringwald or Ally Sheedy; washed-up actresses who make you wonder why they were ever popular to begin with. Can you say "Summer Stock?"

Mad Dog and Glory may be right up your alley—a lot of people were laughing, hard, at the showing I attended. In its attempts to be an original, different comedy, Mad Dog loses its focus and turns out to be a lame, pointless experiment. It's easy to see now why this film was delayed so much. Someone should have put this Dog out of its misery a long time ago. C-

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Business talks prove especially rewarding today. Friends are a great source of encouragement and support today. An interest in community affairs could lead to new employment.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Money comes and goes rapidly today. Be careful not to let your resources dwindle. A financial burden will soon be lifted. Balance hard work with recreational fun.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Stay focused at work. Do not allow errands or outside distractions to slow productivity. Progress is made by handling routine matters carefully. Seek expert advice if legal questions arise.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Petty aggravations could slow you down this morning, just when you think one little problem is solved, another springs up. Persevere! An older person is eager to get in touch with you.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Answering hard to regard as a personal matter may not work out. Do not despair! Romance looks highly promising. A member of the opposite sex shows new interest in your plans.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Your ideas about romance may be on target. Do not abandon love, but resist the urge to rush in blindly. Financial assistance comes when you need it most. A letter brings welcome news.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): An excellent week to build better work relationships—side by side you and an associate will march to victory. Open communication helps your house swimming deal.

SCORPIO (Oct. 24-Nov. 21): You begin to realize that the real blessings in life are far more important than fame and fortune. Handle paperwork promptly or risk having penalized for a missing a deadline.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 12): Listen attentively today, you could learn a valuable lesson. People on both sides of an issue have important points to make. Give a "thumbs down" to most investment schemes.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Handle financial matters and career affairs with diplomacy. Excessive haste could slow you down in the long run. Good grooming is essential now.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): With your fashionable attire and confident style, you are poetry in motion. Fanfare and affection echo back when you promote yourself and your ideas.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Luckily, you have the charm and flair to promote your long-range interests. A financial misunderstanding takes root. Distant "gold" may be mined. Work at a moderate pace to avoid careless errors.

Year honors last season. Rutgers' Jamal Philips, who was the league's top freshman last season, was not named to any conference team Saturday.

St. Joseph's guard Bernard Blunt joined Williams, Roe, Moore and McKie on the A-10 first team. Williams was the only senior on the team.

UMass forward Tony Barbee was named to the conference's second team along with George Washington freshman Yinka Dare, who also claimed A-10 Freshman of the Year honors, George Washington guard Dirkk Surles, Rutgers guard Steve Worthy and Rhode Island forward Abdul Fox.

UMass freshman Dana Dingle, a forward from the Bronx, N.Y., was named to the All-Freshman Team and Minuteman point guard Derek Kellogg was selected to the All-Academic Team.

Kellogg, a sophomore Arts & Science major from Springfield, has a 3.06 grade point average.

Comedian Bill Cosby made an unexpected visit to the awards banquet. Cosby, an alumnus and trustee of Temple and a graduate school alum of Massachusetts, said the A-10 has always been his league. He added he would be rooting for the Owls during the Tournament.

Cosby entertained the 250 in attendance with a number of jokes and said before departing, "Thanks for not inviting me and I hope you at least ate some Jell-o pudding for dessert."

Join the fight against hunger.
Here's your weapon.

Now each time you use the Card, you help buy a meal for a hungry person.

Our goal? To help buy 1,000,000 meals* for America's hungry. And you can take part just by using the American Express Card.

You see, each time you charge a purchase to the Card between March 15 and April 30, 1993, you help pay for one meal. The more purchases you make, no matter how big or small, the more meals you help provide. It's that simple.

To make it all work, we've teamed up with Share Our Strength, a nationwide non-profit organization fighting to end hunger. They're doing it in some very resourceful ways.

For example, most restaurants have extra food at the end of the night, but they don't always know what to do with it. SOS does. They see to it that the food is delivered to those who need it. In fact, they've mobilized more than 5000 restaurants to join the fight against hunger, here in the U.S. and around the world.

So remember, now one of the most valuable reasons to use the Card isn't for what you can get, but for what you give.

If you're not currently a Cardmember, but would like to apply, please call us at 1-800-365-AMEX.

Minutewomen get a big win

By JEFF CROFTS
Collegian Staff

By fighting back from a 10 point second half deficit on the road at the University of Rhode Island, the University of Massachusetts women's basketball team fought their way past URI in overtime, 70-69, and into a No. 5 seed in the upcoming Atlantic 10 tournament.

The Minutewomen were down 34-24 early in the second half, but battled back with a 12-4 run over a five minute span to get back in the ballgame. Rhode Island held on to the lead until Kim Kristofik hit two free throws to put UMass up 51-50 with 7:33 left in the contest.

Rhode Island fought back to take a 61-59 advantage with 22 seconds remaining, but UMass freshman guard Kim Gregory hit an eight-foot jumper with 11 seconds remaining to tie the contest at 63 and send it into overtime.

Down 63-61 in overtime, UMass went on a 8-0 run keyed by Kristofik's four points. URI's Anne Kelsen (21 points) hit a three-pointer with 38 seconds left in OT to cut the UMass lead to three at 69-66. UMass junior guard Maleeka Valentine, however, drained one of two free throws to secure the win for UMass.

UMass was led by freshman forward Octavia Thomas who scored a game-high 25 points and pulled down 10 rebounds. Kristofik, a wily senior, scored 20 points and snagged 10 rebounds to join Thomas in the double-double club.

Kim Gregory was the only other UMass player in double figures as she scored 14 points and dished out four assists.

Freshman center Melissa Gurile was a defensive anchor for the Minutewomen as she swatted four shots and had two swipes as well. In all, five UMass defenders had at least two steals.

The victory improves UMass' record to 11-14 overall and 6-8 in the A-10 conference. The Minutewomen will now be the No. 5 seed in the A-10 tournament and will play No. 4 seed West Virginia on Thursday. Rhode Island falls to 11-15 overall and 5-9 in the league. The WRams will be the No. 6 seed in the tourney.

GAME NOTES: The Atlantic 10 tournament starts on Thursday with four games. If UMass gets by WVU, the Minutewomen will then face off with the winner of the game between No. 1 seed Rutgers (18-8, 12-2) and No. 8 St. Bonaventure (13-13, 2-12) on Friday.

Williams added six, while Tony Barbee and Roe added four apiece in the stretch.

"When UMass went on the run, we tried to weather the storm but we weren't running our offense properly and our type of defensive intensity in the first half wasn't there," said St. Bonaventure's David Vanterpool, who threw in 19 points.

After the "10 minutes of Hell" ended, Moore tried in vain to carry St. Bonaventure, scoring 15 of the Bonnies' 17 points down the stretch, getting them within 69-56 with only 1:40 left. The 6-foot-8 forward's points came on three-pointers, foul shots, and everything in between. Unfortunately for the eighth seed, Moore's awesome output meant the Minutemen had shut down St. Bonaventure's other scoring options.

UMass takes on Rhode Island tonight at 7 p.m. in the first game of an A-10 semifinal doubleheader. The Minutemen said they do not see the game as a grudge match.

"It's kind of like not really revenge, but it's one and done, so every game is important," said Barbee. "We have to take advantage, we have to win to stay alive."

Player of the Game

Derek Kellogg, 6-3 So. Guard

For the second time in as many games, the Minutemen's floor general gets the prestigious award. Kellogg turned up the tempo after committing four turnovers in the first half, dishing out 11 assists. He tied the score at the half, scored a career-high 19 points in 36 minutes of action, and only lost the ball once in the second half.

Why UMass won

"Ten minutes of Hell" did the Bonnies in. Tied at 32, the defense combined with bulls-eye shooting, breaking out to a 16-point lead at the nine-minute mark. St. Bonaventure relied too much on the great play of Harry Moore, who led the game with 26 points. UMass was helped by strong performances from Derek Kellogg and Dana Dingle who started his third consecutive game at small forward.

UMass' next opponent

The Minutemen play the Rams in the rubber match of the season series. UMass won at home in January by an 84-72 count. Jerome Malloy scored a career-high 24 points. The second game, one which still leaves a bad taste in UMass' players mouths, was won by URI in Providence, 71-68. UMass had a lead with 27 seconds left, but blew the game as Rhode Island snapped the Minutemen's 12-game winning streak.

Minutemen defeat Bonnies, 75-62

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

JOSH REYNOLDS / COLLEGIAN

Harper Williams, seen here in last week's victory over St. Bonaventure, and the rest of the Minutemen take on the New England rival Rhode Island tonight in one A-10 semifinal.

PHILADELPHIA—The University of Arkansas basketball team's slogan is called "40 minutes of Hell," based on the tough all-out style of ball. If the University of Massachusetts basketball team were to adopt such a slogan, they would call their play "10 minutes of Hell."

The Minutemen (21-6) last night played what was, at least in the last three weeks, typical UMass basketball. The team sleep-walked through the first half, deciding to play hard in the second half in their 75-62 conquest of St. Bonaventure University at the Palestra in the quarterfinals of the Atlantic 10 Tournament.

The Minutemen were led in scoring by point guard Derek Kellogg, whose 19 points and 11 assists helped UMass avoid one of the biggest embarrassments of their season.

"It wasn't what I'd like to call vintage UMass basketball," said UMass head coach John Calipari. "But I'm always telling these guys, you're one game away from humiliation."

St. Bonaventure (10-17) hung tough during the first twenty minutes, playing aggressively on defense and containing Harper Williams and Lou Roe. The Bonnies took the lead with 4:50 left in the half when Garland Mance (19 points) stole the ball and coasted in for the lay-up and the 18-16 lead.

Things would get more humiliating, as the Bonnies led by six, 25-19, at the end of their 9-2 run, punctuated by Harry Moore's skywalking slam. Moore's effort brought the Palestra crowd into the game, cheering against UMass. It also prompted Calipari to call a timeout in an attempt to regroup. UMass was able to pull to a 29-29 time when Kellogg hit a buzzer-beating three-pointer right before the half.

In the second half, UMass went on its "10 minutes of Hell." Down 33-31 with 18:28 left, the Minutemen went on a 26-8 run which all but secured the win. Buried within the run were two 8-0 stretches in which UMass shut the Bonnies down. On offense, Kellogg distributed the ball well, as Jerome Malloy (12 points) scored seven,

Calipari, McKie honored

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

PHILADELPHIA — Temple guard Aaron McKie was named Atlantic 10 Player of the Year Saturday, edging out University of Massachusetts center Harper Williams, last season's award winner, for the honor.

Williams' coach, John Calipari, claimed the conference's Coach of the Year award for leading the Minutemen (20-6, 11-3 in the A-10) to a second-straight regular season league title.

McKie, a junior from Philadelphia, led the A-10 in scoring by pouring in 20.5 points per game. The 6-foot-5 McKie also pulled down 6.1 rebounds and dished out 3.5 assists per game in leading the Owls to a 15-11 (8-6 in the A-10) mark.

"I'm happy to receive the recognition," McKie said, "A-10 Player of the Year is a real honor, but I couldn't have accomplished it without (Temple) Coach (John) Chaney and my teammates."

Williams, who averaged 16.1 points, eight rebounds and 2.2 blocks per contest for the Minutemen, missed nine games this season with a broken right hand. Calipari said the down time likely cost Williams the award. McKie, who received all but nine of the 32 votes for Player of the Year, started all 26 Owl games.

"I don't care that I didn't win the award," said Williams, who joined teammate Lou Roe on the conference's first team.

"It doesn't mean anything. I didn't care when I won it last year. I just want to win the tournament."

Calipari said Williams should have captured the award but was hurt by his unselfish play, which does not show up in statistical categories.

"I thought Harper should have won it," Calipari said. "The nine games out hurt him, but also that he doesn't shoot the ball 20 times a game."

Williams averaged 12.1 field goal attempts a game this season, while McKie launched 16.6 shots a contest.

St. Bonaventure's Harry Moore, also an A-10 first team member, said McKie, who he grew up with in Philadelphia, deserved the honor.

"I'm really happy for Aaron," Moore, a junior forward, said. "He's a great player and a class guy. He works so hard, I know he earned it."

Calipari praised his staff and his team in accepting his first A-10 coaching award.

"I have the best assistants in the country," Calipari said. "I also have a team which is willing to give up individual glories to play in a team oriented system."

Williams said, "It's good Coach finally got the appreciation he deserves."

Roe, a sophomore from Atlantic City, N.J., averaged 14.4 points and 9.2 rebounds per game in becoming the youngest member of the conference's first team.

"It feels great to be on the first team," Roe said. "It's a privilege to be recognized."

Roe said he did not receive any extra satisfaction for making the first team after being shunned for Freshman of the

During the final minutes of the game, Ram partisans chanted "We want UMass." They will get their wish.

The Rams played aggressive defense and rode the offensive production of guard Carlos Easterling (18 points) and forward Mike Brown (14 points).

The Colonials were led by center Yinka Dare, who scored 15 points, grabbed 14 boards, and blocked five shots. URI held the Colonials to 34.8 percent shooting, while converting 45.6 percent of its shots.

"I want to play UMass," Easterling said. "It's going to be a dogfight."

St. Joe's 71, Rutgers 70

Bernard Blunt completed a three-point play on a baseline drive with 12 seconds left to give the Hawks a one-point victory over Rutgers.

St. Joe's, which trailed most of the game, went ahead 64-63 with 3:38 left when Mark Bass hit a three-pointer. Rutgers retook the lead on an Eddie Jones layup, and lead until Blunt's basket and free throw gave St. Joe's the 71-70 edge.

Rutgers' Steve Worthy, who led the Scarlet Knights with 17 points, missed a potential winning shot at the buzzer.

Temple guard Aaron McKie solidified his claim as A-10 Player of the Year by scorching West Virginia for 28 points yesterday in the Owls 80-53 victory.

Temple (16-11) dominated the Mountaineers (16-11) throughout with a stifling defense and a balanced attack. Temple forward Eddie Jones pumped in 19 points, and center William Cunningham added 15.

Temple held the Mountaineers to only 19 points in the first half. Then made thirteen steals in the game.

"We really went after it defensively tonight," Jones said. "We knew that we needed this game and we'd have to win it on the defensive end."

Cult leader wants 'war,' says official

By MICHAEL HOLMES
Associated Press

WACO, Texas — A heavily armed cult's leader seems eager to provoke another gunfight to fulfill his apocalyptic prophecies, telling negotiators, "We are ready for war" and "Let's get it on," the FBI said Monday.

As the cult's standoff with hundreds of lawmen ground through its ninth day, FBI spokesman Bob Ricks disclosed details of telephone conversations that negotiators have had with David Koresh and more than 30 followers.

Koresh claims to have explosives that would blow the FBI's Bradley armored personnel carriers "40 or 50 feet into the air," so the agency on Monday moved in several 67-ton Abrams main battle tanks for protection, the spokesman said. He said they would be unarmed and strictly for defense.

Koresh says he has been prepared for a fight since 1985, and some of his Branch Davidian followers say they are ready to follow him to their deaths, Ricks said.

Koresh and his followers battled with federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms agents for nearly an hour on Feb. 28, killing four agents and wounding 16; 10 cult members also may have died.

Since then, hundreds of law enforcement officers have surrounded the 77-acre Mount Carmel compound about 10 miles east of Waco.

In telephone conversations, Koresh initially was offended by reports he considered himself Christ. But in calls focusing on Bible studies, Rick

Minutemen trounce URI

Men's basketball team takes their revenge in 76-50 win

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY

JOSH REYNOLDS / COLLEGIAN

Tony Barbee, shown here against St. Joseph's, and the Minutemen defeated URI 76-50 last night in the semifinals of the Atlantic 10 Tournament.

PHILADELPHIA — If revenge is truly a diah served cold, then the University of Massachusetts basketball team had an extra large helping in the Atlantic 10 Tournament semifinals last night, thanks to the ice cold shooting of Rhode Island in the 76-50 Minutemen victory.

How dominating were the Minutemen (22-6) in avenging the Feb. 20 71-68 loss in Providence? They had more rebounds than the Rams had points.

Rhode Island shot 29 percent in the first half and only 32 percent for the game. Their 50 points was a season-low, as was their 16 field goals. UMass sophomore Lou Roe was a one-man show, scoring 16 of his 24 points in the first half. Roe, a 6-foot-7 forward playing as a center, had one of his best collegiate outings by playing above the rim and grabbing 9 of UMass' 51 boards.

"How 'bout Lou Roe tonight?" head coach John Calipari asked reporters. "He played above the rim tonight and was strong, which is the way he should play every day."

Roe dominated Rafael Solis and Mike Moten defensively and offensively from the opening tip. His monster rebounds set the tempo for the rest of the team. As one UMass fanatic at the Palestra stated on a banner, it was time to "Refuse to Lou's."

"Rhode Island had been talking all week, saying how they were waiting for this game," Roe said. "I just wanted to show that I was worthy of being named to the first team all A-10."

Roe's eight first-half boards helped UMass dominate the glass by a comfortable 27-12 margin. He was probably unaware that he was also named to the District 1 USBWA All-Star team Monday afternoon, as was Harper Williams.

UMass had runs of 7-0, 5-0 and 6-0 in the first half en route to the comfortable 37-22 halftime lead. The Minutemen beat Rhode Island to every loose ball it seemed, and were always a step ahead of the fifth-seeded Rams. UMass outscored Rhode Island 20-2 in second chance

Students of Engine 3 learn real-life lessons

COLLEGIAN / JENNY PAREJA

Student firefighter Jeff Winn, a political science major, poses in the East Pleasant Street fire station's Engine 2.

By ADAM RATTINER
Collegian Staff

A house fire on Laurel Lane in Amherst sent four University of Massachusetts students scurrying for Engine 3.

Student firefighters Matt Putnam, Dave Sylvanowicz, Sarah Marsh and Colin Campbell were at the North Fire Station just up the road from Sylvan Residential area. Driver/firefighter Putnam and Captain Dave Sylvanowicz waited approximately three minutes until firefighters Marsh and Campbell arrived and in less than one minute they were driving to the fire.

Putnam said Engine 3 got stuck in the snow about a block away from Friday's fire. Student firefighters Campbell, Marsh and Officer Sylvanowicz ran 300 feet of hose to the back of the house where they suppressed any further fire.

The North Fire Station is located on the corner of Eastman Lane and East Pleasant Street next to the Sylvan halls. Among the student firefighters who live at the station are UMass seniors William Hill, Scott Smith, Dave Lang, Pat O'Brien, Jeff Winn and Putnam.

Putnam pointed out some of the major features of the firehouse, which won a creativity competition when it was first constructed in 1975 for creativity. It doesn't look like a firehouse but more like a very postmodern cement spaceship.

Students to vote in new student gov't

By ALYSSA M. OWENS
Collegian Staff

Students go to the polls to cast their votes to elect a student government president and a student representative to the Board of Trustees today and tomorrow from 11 a.m. to 7 p.m.

see related story, page 3

David Nuñez and Jennifer Fazzi are the presidential candidates. Jeff Turco, Al Lizana and Kevin Jourdain are running for student trustee.

Candidates commented yesterday on their feelings going into the election.

"I feel a little nervous, a little anxious and a lot of relief that the campaign is finally over," Nuñez said. "I think that out of all of the candidates, I can do the best job getting people interested in feeling most comfortable about student government."

Fazzi said, "I feel very optimistic. I'm here to represent the student body and voice their concerns. I'll do that to the best of my ability if elected."

Commenting on Monday's candidates' debate, Jourdain said, "I wish the debate focused more on financial solvency, instead of character assasination on multiculturalism."

"I believe that I'm the Ross Perot of this candidacy," Jourdain said. "I offer the alternative to the other two trustees."

Trash room fire on 7th floor empties Washington Tower

A fire on the seventh floor of Washington Tower sent smoke pouring out of a trash room and set off the floor's sprinkler system at about 3 p.m. on Monday afternoon.

Tom Betterbid, a seventh floor resident, said that, shortly after his return from the showers, he "could smell smoke, the alarm starting going off, and everyone evacuated."

The fire started in one of the grey barrels in the trash room of the seventh floor. The cause of the fire has not been officially determined, yet.

Although officials had told students that reentry to the building would be delayed for at least two hours, students were permitted to enter only an hour after evacuation.

Upon their return to the tower, residents were greeted by signs instructing them to take the stairs while the elevator crew worked at fixing the immobile elevators.

There was talk of well-saturated carpets and water drippings that had seeped down from the seventh floor all the way to the basement.

Marcia Armstrong, the operations manager, said, "A thorough cleaning is needed to really assess the damage done. The elevators had water pouring out of them. It was like taking a shower."

UMass Police Log

Compiled by Brian Gormley

Recent incidents recorded by the University's Department of Public Safety.

ASSAULT & BATTERY

• An individual riding his bicycle nearing Clark Hill Road reported he was knocked from his bicycle by a male subject Friday night. He was then allegedly beaten by group of 7-8 male subjects. He said one of the subjects struck him in the back with a cane and stole his bicycle. The incident is under investigation.

• A man exiting Cance Friday night said he was beaten by four male subjects. The incident is under investigation.

LARCENY

• Saturday night an individual in Butterfield reported his camera lens stolen. The lens was valued at $150.

• Sunday morning an individual in Butterfield said he observed two subjects leaving the dorm with guitar cases. He said that when he yelled at them, they ran. One of the guitars was valued at $600.

• Sunday afternoon an individual in Butterfield reported that he returned to pick up band equipment from a supposedly locked room. A bass pedal valued at $250 was stolen.

• Sunday afternoon an individual in Butterfield reported he also returned to pick up band equipment and reported his guitar and case stolen. A foot controller was also stolen. The goods were valued at over $1200.

• Sunday afternoon an individual in Washington reported that an individual stole his Sega-Genesis game from his unlocked room. The game was valued at $250.

• Sunday afternoon an individual in North Village reported her bicycle stolen. The bicycle was left in front of the apartment. The bicycle was valued at $150.

the hall. The four double rooms where the students live look like average dorm rooms with the exception of of the toy ambulances and firetrucks that litter the floors of some of them.

Putnam pointed out the full-sized firetrucks, including the 1990 full-time firefighters' truck and the students' 1968 truck or Engine 3. The newer truck is equipped with a chain beneath the axle which spins under the rear tires on slippery roads. Engine 3 is a state-of-the-art firetruck, equipped with a 500-gallon water tank and air tanks.

Putnam, a Dean's List student, rattled off the exact amount of air pressure from the five firehoses on the truck and how many gallons of water per minute came out of each firehose.

The fire station houses weight-lifting equipment, an aerobics room and a 50-cent soda machine. Putnam said he "lives" on Diet Coke.

Putnam is about 6-foot-4-inches tall, cheerful, blond, slim with wide shoulders. He is an emergency medical technician and a firefighter. New student firefighters attend a EMT-basic course during their first year (preferably as freshmen) and a department pump operator course during their second year.

There are 16 student firefighters all together, with 15 men and one woman.

Although all are University of Massachusetts students, membership is open to students at Amherst and Hampshire colleges. Student firefighters must maintain a minimum grade point average of 2.5.

The most intense part of the year for the firefighters is what they call "wonder week." This is a week before school starts in the fall in which the student firefighters must learn to work together very quick. They drill every day, all day. The only relief comes in the form of the banana pancakes they take turns making each morning.

Smith and Hill stressed that although they were all having fun, they became different people when it was time to work.

For example, Saturday evening there was another fire that could have been a catastrophe. The full-time firefighters were responding to a false alarm at the University of Massachusetts at the time. The first firemen at the scene were student fighters Hill, Putnam and Smith in the four-wheel-drive truck and Captain Sylvanowicz, Lt. O'Brien, Lt. Winn and firefighter Lee Gianetti in Engine 3. The student firefighters succeeded in putting the fire out. They were up until 4 a.m. The night before some of them were also up until 3 or 4 a.m. helping with Friday's devastating house fire.

The students said there were some funny experiences despite the seriousness of firefighting. Jeff Winn said he was "singing Mr. Heatmizer on the way back from a fire at 3 a.m. in the morning."

Scott Smith said he remembered going to a fire up on a hill after everyone had finished eating banana pancakes.

"We had to run hoses up and down this hill. It was a lot of heavy lifting and one fire fighter just upchucked the pancakes."

They said the largest amount of false fire alarms from the University of Massachusetts was 15 in one night.

Rally lauds candidates for student gov't

Enhancing multiculturalism and campus unity was the focus of a rally at which eight people spoke before a crowd of about 50 on the Student Union steps yesterday.

The Campus Unity Rally was sponsored by the campaign to elect David Nuñez and Al Lizana for student government president and student trustee.

"We must move toward multiculturalism on this campus, not practice the politics of denial and division and subscribe to the myopic view of exclusion," said Matt Malone, University Democrats member and media coordinator for the Lesbian Gay Bisexual Alliance.

"There are some that say that the offices of student government president and student trustee have nothing to do with ideology," Malone said. "I say they're wrong."

Malone said Nuñez and Lizana visited all campus organizations to ask for their encouragement and vote in the election."

"None was too small or narrow," Malone said.

Neil Carpenter, president of College Democrats of Massachusetts, held up a campaign poster of student government president and student trustee candidates Jennifer Fazzi and Jeff Turco.

"Real students working on real issues," said Carpenter, reading the poster. Carpenter said he felt Fazzi and Turco were not fighting for all of the "real issues."

"In fighting for one group's education, they are not working for the all groups' education," Carpenter said.

Steve Sparling, vice president of Hillel House, and Ric Townes, dean of Academic Support Services, also spoke, asking students to support the enhancement of multiculturalism and to fight oppression on campus.

Sparling and Townes urged students to vote in the student government election.

"Last semester was very painful for all of us. A lot of students are angry and offended," Lizana said.

"We can't put multiculturalism on the back burner," Lizana said. "If Dave and I lose this election, we could move 30 years back in race relations."

Nuñez said, "If Al and I are elected, we will provide information to students and deal with issues effectively on this campus."

"Do you pay your tuition bill? Do you pay your fees? Then I represent you," Nuñez said.

ELECTION INFORMATION:

Elections for student government president and student trustee are today and tomorrow from 11 a.m. to 7 p.m.

Two campus referendums are included on the ballot.

One calls for ratification of the student government constitution. If passed by the student body, the constitution would move to the Board of Trustees for approval.

Passage of the constitution by the Board of Trustees would make it a legal document under state law.

The second referendum deals with the UMass Hemp initiative and was submitted through a petition by the UMass Cannabis Reform Coalition.

WHERE TO VOTE:

Southwest South: Berkshire DC
Southwest North: Hampshire DC
Central/Orchard Hill: Franklin DC
Northeast/Sylvan: Worcester DC
Commuters: The Hatch
Greeks: Newman Center

Hotel employees really just actors, says CEO

By ARTHUR STAPLETON
Collegian Staff

"The hotel industry mirrors the entertainment business like no other," said Loews Hotels President and Chief Executive Officer Jonathan M. Tisch before a capacity crowd in Bowker Auditorium last night.

"People want more than just a place to eat and sleep. They want a hotel experience, one that brings a touch of fantasy to their everyday lives."
– Jonathan M. Tisch
President and CEO,
Loews Hotels

Tisch, who is also the treasurer for the National Football League's New York Giants, cast a different picture of the hotel business than is portrayed in popular culture as part of a program sponsored by the UMass School of Hotel, Restaurant, and Travel Administration.

The program began with a video presentation which compared the hotel business to show business, capturing moments of some famous and not-so-famous movies. Tisch discussed how movies such as Pretty Woman and Beverly Hills Cop used a hotel as the center of action in the film.

"Many of the scenes set in hotels are filled with comical mishaps. Often times humor does arise from something that is unexpected," Tisch said. "Well, that may work in the movies, for Eddie Murphy and Julia Roberts, but in real life, nothing in a hotel is supposed to happen by accident. Everything is supposed to go according to script."

Along with the video, Tisch lectured on entertainment in the hospitality business, recounting trips to such places as EuroDisney, which calls its workers "castmembers."

Tisch told of a hotel he visited this fall that had a sign hanging on the entrance from the inside offices to the main lobby that read "Stage Door," which, according to Tisch, sent a definite message to employees.

"That sign sent an important signal: inside you may be the assistant manager suffering from a major hangover. . . but once you walk through that door, you're on," Tisch said.

When discussing the possibilities of advertising and public relations in the realm of hotels, Tisch said their budgets are very limited, and they have to resort to free media exposure.

Tisch said that it is an obligation of persons in the hotel industry to meet the needs of the consumer. Advertising, according to Tisch, requires a subtle skill of not promising either too much or too little.

"People want more than just a place to eat and sleep. They want a hotel experience, one that brings a touch of fantasy to their everyday lives," said Tisch.

Tisch believes that more social commitment will help when it comes to reaching professional goals, especially in the world of hotel, restaurant, and travel administration. He said that being creative is very important because your actions will be noticed.

"In the chaotic world of hotels, you are going to need to muster up every ounce of creativity you can to get your name out there," said Tisch. "Because, although you'll leave here with a diploma from a very prestigious institution, it won't be enough to insure your success in this increasingly challenging and competitive industry."

Harvard prof. weighs options for radioactive waste disposal

By TOM KNIGHT
Collegian Staff

Harvard University Earth and Planetary Sciences Professor Ed Roedder, spoke about the viability of several methods of radioactive waste disposal last Friday in the Morrill Science Center Auditorium in a lecture sponsored by the UMass geology department.

Roedder, who first got involved in nuclear energy research in the 1950s, said he remembers nuclear advocates predicting that "nuclear energy would be so abundant that no one would need a meter in their house."

Describing himself as a "nuclear energy advocate with a few reservations," Roedder said he believes the safest method for radioactive waste disposal may be "to shoot it to the sun."

"But then what happens if the stuff comes back down?" he asked.

According to Roedder, the most politically and economically viable disposal method may be to "cool" solidified radioactive waste inside multi-walled containers in ventilated hilltops in arid, isolated terrain well above the water table.

Roedder said that nonsensical governmental regulation prevented this method from having been widely implemented.

Roedder admitted that both government and industry have failed so far in coming up with a safe and cost-effective plan for dealing with radioactive waste disposal.

According to Roedder, "billions of dollars have gone done the drain already. We're leaving our children a $200 billion unpaid garbage bill. Quite a legacy."

Faculty play the fools in a Purim food fight

By ERICA MOSS
Collegian Correspondent

With humor and a good dose of spoof, four distinguished members of the University of Massachusetts faculty debated the merits of latkes and hamantash, Sunday afternoon as part of Hillel's Purim celebration.

The latke, a potato pancake eaten during Chanukah, was defended by Stephen Clingmann, of the English department and Eric Nusbaum, of Hotel Restaurant and Travel Administration. The inherent superiority of the hamantash, a fruit-filled pastry eaten during Purim, was defended by Stephen Malkin of mechanical engineering and Lee Edwards, dean of the Humanities and Fine Arts.

The debates began after Rabbi Saul Perlmutter gave a brief introduction of Purim, a holiday that celebrates the Jews deliverance from Persia. The audience participated in the debates by loudly shaking noisemakers.

Eric Nusbaum presented, "The Latke: A Politically Correct Consumable." He emphasized that the hamantash was a "politically offensive object." He explained that since the hamantash resembles the shape of a hat, it focuses on material objects and what people wear. Those less fortunate who cannot even afford a hat may take offense towards this, he said. Nusbaum said it distinguishes the poor from the wealthy and therefore is not politically correct. He concluded by encouraging latke eating because it "insults no one and benefits all."

On the contrary, Stephen Malkin in the defense of the hamantash, argued the "Geomatrial and Geometrical Symbolism of the Hamantash." He used mathematical equations to explain why the hamantash is superior to that of the latke.

According to his mathematical calculations the hamantash is "quantitative real stuff." He indicated that three latkes equal one hamantash proving the hamantash to be far more superior than the latke. The nice triangular shape of the hamantash is geometrically preferable according to Malkin. Compared to the hamantash said Malkin, everything else is "completely superfluous."

Stephen Clingman stood up to defend the latke. He debated how "My Latke's like a Red, Red Rose: The Suppressed Trace of the Latke in English Literature." He spoke of the latkes suppression traced back until the Middle Ages. His humorous parallels to English Literature, using famous works such as the Canterbury Tales, entertained all.

Clingman said that the pilgrims were not searching for St. Thomas of Becket rather they were in search for the perfect latke. He continued with examples from famous poets such as Keats, T.S Elliot and Yates. He mentioned Bob Dylan as being a latke lover himself. He said if you were to play some of Dylans' songs backwards you would not hear the devils name instead it would give you "marvelous latke recipes." He concluded his argument, "The unconscious is structured like a latke".

Lee Edwards, in favor of the hamantash presented "A Prune of Ones Own: Feminism, Literature and Hamantashen." Taking the feminist point of view, she defended the hamantash by saying it is an indication of "sexual ambiguity."

By creating an essay that was supposedly written by Virginia Woolf, Edward presented how the hamantash is "better than melon or apples." She made sexual innuendos to describe her approval of this pastry. According to Edwards this inspired Woolf to write her essay "Justice will not be served until we have a prune of our own."

The debates came to a close as a final decision on the winner neared — latke or hamantash? Rabbi Perlmutter reached into his pocket to pull out the winner of the two foods. Instead he pulled out a fluorescent tie and announced "It's a tie."

said, "We are now getting a message that it is probably much more than him just being a prophet. He is probably a messiah and he is here to fulfill the prophecies."

"He has made such statements as, 'We are ready for war.' 'Let's get it on.' 'Your talk is becoming in vain.' 'I'm going to give you the opportunity to save yourselves before you get blown away,'" Ricks said.

Nevertheless, negotiations continued with Koresh, Ricks said.

The FBI official said negotiators have talked with 33 people inside the compound.

"Those that we spoke with on each occasion verified that Mr. Koresh had indicated that these individuals were free to leave at any time."

"They were all completely devoted to David and what he was trying to accomplish," the official said.

However, negotiators also talked with a woman who said she and her five children would like to leave, but those talks have broken down, according to Ricks. Twenty-one children have been released from the compound.

"Al and Dave look at multiculturalism as the end all be all of issues. I offer myself as a balanced candidate," Jourdain said.

Turco said, "I believe the students will see to their tactics in voting for the best student trustee. Once again, my record speaks for itself."

Lizana said, "I feel very optimistic and I'm confident the students will make the right decision. The bigger the vote, the more confident I'll be."

"The real issues that effect the campus as a whole are Legal Services, Whitmore, Health Services," Fazzi said. "I will voice the student concerns equally."

"I have been fighting for real student issues for four years in the Senate and the Greek area," Turco said.

■ waste

Roedder's talk was timely in that the Low-Level Radioactive Waste Management Board, whose mission it is to promulgate binding regulations on the disposal of radioactive waste generated in the state, toured western Massachusetts last week as part of the public comment period.

The Board was established in response to new federal law requiring all 50 states to develop long-term radioactive waste disposal plans.

Several UMass students were among those in attendance at one of the public comment meetings held last Wednesday evening at the Greenfield Middle School.

Concerns expressed by citizens to the Board included frustration with the process not having gotten greater publicity and board members having an inherent conflict of interest by virtue of their being on the payroll of companies or utilities who generate radioactive waste.

One citizen characterized the radioactive waste disposal debate a "rubber stamp affair."

Board members insisted that they had not yet decided whether they will even recommend that a radioactive waste disposal facility be located in this state.

One option being considered is joining a multi-state compact and sending the radioactive waste generated here out of state.

A decision on the possible siting of a radioactive waste disposal facility in Massachusetts could come as soon as July.

Bombs, Jesus, the Flintstones: it's the end of the world

I think the world is coming to an end. Just look at the evidence:

First the World Trade Center gets bombed, killing five and injuring 1,000 people. In the aftermath of the attack, Radovan Karadzic, leader of the Bosnian Serbs, all but takes credit for the bombing. Denouncing President Clinton's airdrop of humanitarian aid to all parties to the Balkan conflict, he declares, "The tragic and deplorable terrorist incident at the World Trade Center is fresh testimony to the extraordinary volatility and immediate dangers of direct foreign involvement."

Sound like it's time to follow up on this one? Well, they've got a suspect, but he's part of a group that's supposed to be trying to overthrow the Egyptian government. Now there's a real big issue in world politics — my only question is why didn't they bomb something sooner? Maybe they let Radovan go because he said he was mistranslated.

The next day, some guy in Waco shoots up the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms. He kills four Feds and wounds another 15, while at least two of his cult followers are killed and who knows how many are injured. But the worst part of it is that David Koresh, the cult leader, claims he's Jesus.

He babbles on CNN about the "Seven Seals," promising to surrender if the Christian Broadcasting Network — a true forum for well thought out discourse — will play his hour-long sermon. Maybe sensing a chance to win converts, CBN goes along, and Koresh says things like, "If those who know not what they do, or know not that they know not, use force, then we're talking something serious here." Very scriptural.

Jonah GELBACH

Maybe the worst news of all: the Federal Communications Commission imposes strict new rules on TV stations, claiming that the Flintstones and the Jetsons aren't educational. Talk about people who know not what they do. Owr jenirashun gru up wathcin thos shoz awl dae lawng aftir skool an did tha stop us frum lirneeng? Seriously, I learned all about primitive patriarchal capitalism watching Fred get yelled at by Mr. Slate and then go home and yell at Wilma. I even gained my consciousness of animal rights by watching the ceaseless struggle between Fred and the household appliances.

And the Jetsons taught me all about the cutthroat competition in the post-industrial space age: who can forget the time George discovered that Cogswell's building was on six inches of Spacely's property, only to find out that he'd read the blueprint backwards, crushing Spacely's hopes of crushing Cogswell's hopes.

It goes on and on: the Minuteman hasn't printed a single issue all year. Nobody realizes it, but this could be a terribly dangerous sign — maybe the righty writers of our tranquil campus have decided to take a breather, read up on grammar and style and then publish a document that actually contains complete, coherent sentences that mean something more than "Ugh!" Of course, then they'd lose their support from Pat Buchanan, but I guess progress has its price. They never should have let Stefan Gross quit as editor in chief.

If you're not convinced yet that we're headed for apocalypse, here's one more bit of circumstantial evidence: I'm taking a statistics course that God couldn't get an A in. And if the the Almighty starts feeling inferior, we're in for it — remember the flood?

Women's daily struggle calls for daily celebration

Every day is a day to celebrate the achievements of women, because every day women conquer barriers in a male-dominated world. Never has a day gone by when women haven't had to fight for their rights as women in every town, state and country.

Stacy MALONE

On March 8, 1909, New York City's working women in the garment industry went on strike against inhumane working conditions. These women would no longer tolerate the conditions they were exposed to and as poor working-class women they protested for change.

This was a historic day in the women's movement, because women fought for their rights as women and as human beings. March 8 was set aside by the Socialist Party as International Women's Day to honor working women all over the world. It is a time for women around the globe to celebrate their accomplishments in the workforce and to remember the working women whose accomplishments have motivated and pushed the women's movement forward.

Throughout history women have been kept anonymous; their accomplishments do not appear in the history books from which generations after generations are taught. International Women's Day emphasizes the need to remember the history of women because their stories are important parts of history.

International Women's Day is also a day to celebrate our differences as women. The women who protested the garment industry in 1909 were of various cultures and backgrounds and they united to improve conditions in the workplace and in society. They had many cultural differences, but their power through unity organized them.

Cultures, heritages and personal experiences are important to the women's movement, because it is the past and history of women that assist in determining their future. International Women's Day celebrates and honors the victory of working women from various cultural backgrounds who worked together to protest the garment industry while encouraging future hopes for women internationally.

International Women's Day is one day in each year when women are celebrated for their accomplishments to history and society. Yesterday was the day of celebration but it must go farther than just one day out of 365.

Women contribute to society not only by giving birth to children and as cheap labor, but we contribute knowledge, history and countless numbers of experiences that enrich society. Women around the globe need to be recognized and remembered for their contributions to the workforce, history and society every day.

Is LSD misunderstood?

While drug use has declined slightly in recent years, there seems to be a resurgence in use of LSD, especially on college campuses. Sixties icon Timothy Leary's slogan "Tune in, Turn on, Drop out" appears to be rising out of the ashes of the '60s counterculture movement. I spoke with the president of the UMass LSD Coalition yesterday. He informed me he had just ingested two thin squares of LSD in gelatin form several hours before our interview.

David MASSEY

Can you explain to me the purpose of your organization?

SID: We decided to form the coalition to bring more awareness to the beneficial aspects of hallucinogens and offer a friendly atmosphere for students involved in psychedelics. There's a great quote from Timothy Leary that goes something like, "The seeds of the '60s have taken root underground. The blossoming is yet to come."

The '60s are coming back, you know? "Lucy in the Sky With Diamonds," that sort of thing. Our club will show movies like "Alice in Acidland" and give students discounts on books like The Magic Mushroom Grower's Guide. And other stuff like that. Now we're working on becoming an RSO.

Besides being illegal, many scientists and former users say drugs like LSD are extremely dangerous. Why are you promoting their use?

SID: They can open a channel in your mind enhancing your capability to love, you know, understand, to help you comprehend a linguistics class. LSD excites the nervous system and sometimes you can hear colors and see sounds. It helps me relax when I do homework. Stuff on my wall moves around and I feel myself literally sinking into my chair. The Allman Brothers sound fantastic and I feel, like, free.

Don't you worry about flashbacks?

SID: I stress that proper dosages are a must. You gotta be careful or you get screwed. I don't really worry about flashbacks. It's really a mind-altering experience. There are several research projects going on to find out what's really happening inside your brain. Scientists used LSD to study mental illness but unfortunately there's a lack of government research, something our coalition — get that off me — will fight for. Your cassette recorder is melting. I see it. Cool. That thing is off me now, thanks.

You O.K., Sid? From what I've read about LSD, it can impair judgment and make you do dangerous things. And people in a hallucinogenic state often get very depressed. Sid, how do you feel now?

SID: Fine, I'm having a good trip. This drug opens up myself to myself. I can look inside myself and say, "Hey, Sid, what's going on in there?" It's magical. I can unscrew the top of my head and say, "Hello, brain. What's up?" The mind is the final frontier of science, you know? Hey, hello! David, don't you see that sitting next to you?

Excuse me? There's nobody here. Let me ask you —

SID: I saw him, a Blue Meanie. Blue and small and funny and moving around and saying goodbye now. Goodbye, Blue Meanie. That was funny. I'm not on the meal plan because I don't like chicken cutlets. Stay away from there because the DC is freaky and the salad floats around. Yeah, our coalition is open to all university undergraduates.

You were just acting real bizarre just now, Sid.

SID: No, I usually walk to work or ride the bus — that big round one with the singing driver with the ponytail who left the bus through the window. I really wanted to try that but the driver said no. They always do.

Thanks for the interview. I really gotta get going.

SID: Wait — why don't you interview that Blue Meanie? It's probably in the elevator link, that elevator with all those loud buttons on the floor that kind of twist around and say things to me. Well, bye, Blue Meanie.

Why you should vote for hemp

A vote for the Hemp Initiative is not a vote for marijuana to be legal everywhere tomorrow. It is a statement that hemp be given the attention it deserves.

There is no one at UMass who will not benefit from a "yes" vote on Question 2. Since it is not a legally binding question, a vote will be a call that this issue be brought into the public light, where it deserves to be. Since all we want is for people to be more informed, who could possibly be hurt by a "yes" vote?

The facts are there: marijuana, as a drug, is very helpful in treating numerous illnesses, and is less harmful than alcohol, tobacco and many over-the-counter drugs and foods. Hemp, as a plant, offered more benefits to the country than perhaps any other plant, and can be used to replace many products used today, with far less damage to the environment. Those are the facts. They have been researched and documented extensively, and there is plenty of information in the UMACRC office to support them. If you doubt these facts, please stop by our office in 415 Student Union, or our table on the Campus Center Concourse.

Having been deluged with "facts" from the "con" side of the argument for my entire life, and having considered the "pro" side's facts for the past year or so, I am fully convinced that marijuana must re-legalized. Two years ago I was an avid opponent of legalizing drugs. All it took was a look at how I had been misled by the "powers that be," and a look at the proven, researched facts about hemp. Once you open your eyes, the truth is easy to see.

If you think cannabis must remain illegal, you have most likely been misinformed. The Hemp Initiative is a measure to prevent misinformation from obscuring the truth. If anti- and pro-legalization factions were given equal exposure, hemp would once again be legal, as it was for thousands of years before the "green scare" of the late 1930s. If you are unsure about the issue, we wish to supply you with information to let you make an educated choice.

To vote for continued ignorance and misinformation, vote no. To vote for information and education, vote yes on Question 2.

FAC deterioration isn't 'minor'

This letter is to inform the student population of exactly what happened in the Fine Arts Center on Feb. 26. We sustained more than "minor damage" as was reported [Collegian, March 1] after a pipe burst over Bezanson recital hall. Besides the fact that the entire auditorium (including all the seats) was soaked, the organ on stage was damaged by the water as well. We should note the instrument is highly valuable and irreplaceable. This is not the first time an incident such as this has occurred.

Downstairs in the percussion storage room, all our marimbas sustained water damage. Many of the percussionists' personal music and mallets were destroyed, amounting to hundreds of dollars in personal loss. Also, the music which was destroyed in the library is, in many cases, irreplaceable and out of print.

This letter is meant only to clarify what some officials were content to call minor, because we, the music students, have to work in this building. Come visit the FAC if you have a minute. We'd love for other students to see the conditions to which we are subject. If you do come, however, be aware that there are no windows and poor ventilation if you don't want to catch cold. And please, do watch out for falling objects from the ceilings, we wouldn't want anyone injured due to "minor" deterioration.

Cape Verdean students have a rich history to be proud of

By MALKES GOMES
Collegian Staff

Cabo Verde, which stands for green cape or green place, is an archipelago of 10 major islands and several islets which are located in the Atlantic Ocean off the western coast of Africa, approximately 360 kilometers from Senegal, Dakar. The uninhabited islands were discovered by Diogo Gomes and Antonio da Noli under the Portuguese crown in 1460. The first settlers included Portuguese clergy, aristocrats, business men, political exiles, degredados which were criminals exiles out of Portugal, Jews and Europeans from other parts of Europe such as Spain and Italy.

After settlement took place slaves were abstracted from the western coast of Africa mainly from Guinea-Bissau and included Wolof, Mandica, Fula and other groups of Africans. The fusion of these two races resulted in a Crioulo people and culture with roots from both stocks. The current population in Cabo Verde is said to be about 1 percent White, 24 percent Black and 76 percent Mestizo or Crioulo. The population is predominantly Catholic. The official language is Portuguese and the national language is Cape Verdean Crioulo.

Some islands, such as the capitol island of Santiago where the largest population of slaves were sent is said to be the most African. Much of the African elements were saved because the slaves escaped to the fora, which are the hills and mountains.

Historical Analysis

Other islands such as Brava, the smallest of the Cape Verdean Islands, is said to be the more European because of the large amounts of Europeans who settled there because of the more adaptable tropical climate. There are over 350,000 Cape Verdeans and their descendants in the United States.

Emigration from Cabo Verde to the United States began in the mid-1800s because of the severe droughts and famines that have been common in Cabo Verde. Many came because of jobs which opened up on whaling ships which stopped in Cabo Verde, jobs in New Bedford, Massachusetts textile mills and jobs on Cape Cod in the cranberry bogs. Yet, others came out of curiosity and for the adventure of travelling the high seas. The voyage from Cabo Verde in the old days by ship took anywhere from a month to a year.

There are over 50 Cape Verdean Students at UMass-Amherst, many of whom are members of the Cape Verdean Student Alliance. The Cape Verdean Student Alliance is one of the many registered student organizations on campus. One of the organizations' goals is to promote and maintain Cape Verdean culture here on campus and throughout the Five College area, as well as building and strengthening ties within the campus community.

One way in which we have done this is through our yearly Cape Verdean awareness Day conference. This year we will hold our eighth annual conference on March 27, in the Campus Center Auditorium, and conference rooms from 11 a.m. until 6:30 p.m. followed by a dinner and dance with a live Cape Verdean band. There is no charge for the conference part of this program. The day will include a presentation about the Smithsonian Institute Project with Cape Verde, several workshops including Race Relations, Native American and Cape Verdean Interrelations, Problems Faced by non-English speaker in Health Care Systems and other workshops. There will also be a slide presentation, a dance troupe and Dr. Bruce Rose, dean of Student Affairs at Hudson County Community College, N.J., as the keynote speaker.

This will be a day to network, make contacts and to learn something about a different culture that may be similar to your own or very different. This day is open to the entire campus community and non-campus community. We will also hold events each night in the Campus Center throughout the week. For more information, please contact the Cape Verdean Student Alliance at 416 Student Union, Box 156 Campus Center. Hope to see you there.

The Nicaragua of then is the Nicaragua of now

Nicaragua may be a place some of you have heard of, but that you probably know little about. It is a country that, throughout history, had to struggle to obtain the basic necessities of life and is right now is facing what is probably one of its hardest times ever.

In 1990 there was a democratic exchange of power from the Marxist/Leninist Sandinistas to a democratic coalition party. This change brought hopes of a better life. People had high expectations for the new government. They speculated there would be a better economic situation, better education for their children and, most of all, an end to the war between the Sandinistas and the U.S.-subsidized Contras. Unfortunately, despite the change of government, reform has not reached the military, which is still controlled by the Sandinistas. This has divided the people and has hampered economic advancement.

Mercedes
BETANCO

In Nicaragua, historically, the government has always been controlled by the military and the economic scene by the privileged class. With the defeat of the Sandinistas the U.S. government's lifting of the economic embargo, everyone expected a flood of national and foreign investment, but But that has not taken place because the political situation is so unstable. No investors are willing to take chances and invest in a country where nothing seems to have changed, except the person in the presidential seat.

Without the influx of capital and the implementation of drastic reforms aimed towards nationalizing industry, the country's economy will continue to deteriorate daily. The educational system in Nicaragua during the Sandinista reign was free — schools were public. Now it has gone back to being a private business. People are taking their children out of school because they are not able to pay the fees and buy books.

Following the Sandinista fall, private property was to be returned to its original owners, property that had been confiscated by the Sandinistas. But this has not been done; it is not in the best interests of those in control.

People are now realizing that the new government is not able to make their lives better and that, in fact, it may have even made their lives harder. People are literally starving, the unemployment rate is incredibly high, the educational system is not working and the health system is nonexistent.

Nicaragua is returning to the pre-Sandinista era; the rich in control of the government and in the military enjoys the luxuries of power, while the majority starves and suffers the consequences of living under worthless leaders.

How can a country have a future when there is nothing to look forward to? What can one do when they don't know where their next meal is coming from? I truly admire people from Nicaragua because they don't give up. They have hope that some day their lives will improve. They do not ask for much. They only ask for peace and jobs so that they can have the basics to survive.

The average person in Nicaragua is not concerned with luxuries. Parents want only to provide their children with food, some education and maybe a little toy at Christmas.

Nicaragua is a country where, right now, there are children who don't know what it is like to have a decent meal, much less a toy. Until there is some form of political stability, a more organized government and leaders who truly care for the people, there will be neither peace nor economic stability in Nicaragua.

Former Soviet republics face harder times

On December 25, 1991, the USSR was formally disbanded and Gorbachev resigned from office. It was the final step in a multitude of events that several Soviet republics took to achieve independence. From that day on, the world has watched the former Soviet Union with great expectancy. A new era was beginning, the great Communist Empire fell and the birth of several newly independent countries took place. To many Soviets, independence meant new frontiers, and a release from some of the hardships of a socialist regime.

Inês
VIEIRA

Although many perceived change as beneficial to the people of the former Soviet Union, and the world as a whole, the ramifications of such a symbolic modification of the system may prove to be more of a struggle in the end.

The former Soviet Union was under the control of an organized socialist party, which operated from the Kremlin. Although the regime may have failed, it nevertheless must be attributed with the credit it deserves for operating such a large scale government over such a vast area. With 8.6 million square miles, the former Soviet Union was larger than the United States and Canada combined, spreading through 11 time zones, and a multitude of different ethnic groups as part of it's population.

Today, the Kremlin no longer exerts it's power over the former Soviet Union, and countries such as Bosnia, Latura, Ukraine, and Estonia appear on updated world maps.

What most optimistic capitalists fail to realize is that not all is roses for these newly independent countries. Some states have gained the independence long before a capable government was instituted, others face ethnic revolt and bloodshed. One must take into account the mismanagement that the economy of the former Soviet Union has suffered for decades, and the tumbling social crisis affecting the stability needed for a successful "renaissance."

These new independent nations are now being inducted into the Third World community. The countries that rose from the breakdown of the Soviet Union could very well be facing the very same hardships as today's suffering Third World nations.

Decades of strict control along with a severe climate that characterizes a large territory of the Soviet Union, have stripped these countries from the economic prosperity that would be very helpful in the transition into independence. The newly independent states will have to face severe economic instability and hard times before the situation improves. The average former Soviet knows that his country lacks the resources to manage such a transition the best way possible. Approximately all food feeding the peoples of the former U.S.S.R came from a territory in the south region constituting a meek 10% of it's entire territory (U.S.S.R.'s) Now that many of these independent countries are sustaining harsh climate conditions, no land to harvest and no bordering sea to explore, they will have to rely heavily on trade and imports to survive. Neither is this the most practical option nor are these countries equipped with the resources necessary to embark on such a task.

Apart from obvious economic problems, there is yet another problem emerging: group fighting has erupted in various states. The former Soviet Union built borders without taking into consideration the already existing differences between ethnicities, and populated areas such as Siberia with people from several different poles of the East. Now the question of independence has become blurrier than ever. Is it defined by regions or ethnic groups?

Finally all of these states were part of the Soviet Union that possessed nuclear capabilities and the infamous Red Army. Now that this union has been disintegrated, the countries resulting are no longer part of a world power and in many cases must rebuild armies on their own. Certainly a mother who has lost her job and finds no food in the supermarket to feed her children doesn't really wonder about the fall of the great world power. Although this isn't an immediate concern for former Soviets today, it may become one, soon.

The world still watches with expectancy, and celebrates this step to freedom, but at the same time, even optimists wonder how important freedom is to the former Soviets who now struggle with instability and chaos; which could very well lead to the induction of the former Soviet Union into the Third World sphere.

Campus Man looks at style

I don't know where I heard it but I believe, "You can never make a first impression twice." Fair enough, right? More and more men are actually spending time on themselves.

I think it started with the gel revolution. Who knows? It can't hurt to go a little bit out of your way to dress, shall I say, more GQ. A good suggestion might be in addition to those Sports Illustrated subscriptions to pick up a copy or two of Details, Esquire, M and GQ.

Hey if Pat Riley can make the cover of GQ for being fashionable as well as other sports stars why not add a little zest to your image by getting with what's in style?

Adam Scott
ROBERTS

UMass junior Julie Lichtenstein said, "I like a man who has his own unique style and who stands out in a crowd." Other women have mentioned that scent is important. Lichenstein said she believes, "There's something in Eternity that is just overwhelming.

Day after day I get complements like, "You smell really good." It's nice to know that a woman can appreciate you when you hear something like this. I believe that cologne has to do with your mood or attitude. Personally, Obsession for Men is for those days I want to feel smart yet stylish. Chanel for Men is for those days you want to have a real clean-cut day. You've gotta try Safari from Raulph Lauren; it's got a wild tough machismo essence to it. Finally in cologne turf, there's JOOP! (pronounced You-p), the ultimate soft yet strong statement maker. Give 'em a try — ask for samples (they're free too!).

The fraternity/jock look is very in. It all depends how you wear it! (Especially if it's with a L.A., N.Y. or Cincinatti Reds hat.) However, the more appealing way to dress is to dress cool: Jeans (definitely button-fly) with some extra length at the bottom to bunch up. E.G.'s slouch socks (yes they are uni!) but worn underneath and not revealed! Thick black belts are a must and a pair of very "in" Doc's (Marteens). For underneath, boxers with patterns, not those cheap thin one's — try the Gap or Banana Republic and even J. Crew. Some may opt for those tightie whities and its very chic to have Calvin Klein. It must be those Marky Mark ads!

Deborah Levin, manager of J. Rich in Amherst says, "People are buying longer jeans and rolling or cuffing them and even just letting them go long."

"For dressing up, we are selling a lot of pattern vests. Lots of ties from more traditional to the Beatles-inspired ties and people are buying sports shirts for both dress up and casual."

In addition to clothes, accessories are on the rise. "We are selling lots of accessories, especially the Hypnotic Hats, unusual and interesting belts, fun socks like E.G. Smith and we're selling lots of Fossil watches as well as Swatches."

All right we've all heard the dilemma about those 90210-inspired sideburns. Are they in or are they out? Rachel Alves, manager of the North Pleasant Street Hair East Salon says, "They're definitely coming back, and I prefer them, they give a nice tailored look to the haircut."

In addition to burns, hairstyles for men have always been diverse.

"Anything goes with men. The 'in' look is the short sides and back with a bowl look top. That's really in. . . that kind of look," said Alves.

On the other hand Lichtenstein begs to differ. "Sideburns are definitely out. And as for facial hair, I don't like the least bit of stubble — it's dirty looking."

And it may be hard to believe but real men, including fraternity men do take good care of their skin with Clinique Supplies and or toners. One frat boy said "I'm clean. I'll admit to using it but I still don't want you to know my name. . . I use - are you sure you're not going to use my name? - Georgette Clinger, a New York dermatologist line, Cleansing

Buffalo Tom returns home

UMass band brings their acoustic cleverness to Noho

By ERICA C. PLOUFFE
Collegian Correspondent

COURTESY JOHN GOODMAN

That cool UMass band, Buffalo Tom, returns to the Pioneer Valley this Wednesday night.

Amherst's own Buffalo Tom is coming back to the Valley for a one-night only performance at the Iron Horse in Northampton. Although they are known for their most recent single, "Velvet," off of Let Me Come Over, other songs such as "Sunflower Suit," "The Bus" and "Fortune Teller" can be found on their two earlier album releases, Buffalo Tom and Birdbrain.

Buffalo Tom sounds similar to Husker Du, local band Dinosaur Jr. and maybe the Lemonheads with a good guitarist. Incidentally, Jay Mascis, from Dinosaur Jr. had produced Buffalo Tom's first two albums and played lead guitar on a few of their tracks.

Their acoustic guitar ability and clever lyrics set them apart from the average run-of-the-mill college band. They're a bunch of guys, who, besides playing their instruments far better than those of their rock n' roll cohorts, can put on a show that lacks pretentiousness and reeks of genuine enthusiasm.

The band members Bill Janovitz, Tom Maginnis and Chris Colburn all met at here at UMass in 1986. Since all three were guitarists, they had to decide who would play the bass and drums. Maginnis said he was chosen for the drums "because [he] couldn't sing."

From there they migrated, like all good bands do, to Boston. There they produced their first album, Buffalo Tom, and released it in Europe. After an extremely well-received first album, they were signed onto a major recording label Beggar's Banquet. After two more successful albums, Birdbrain and Let Me Come Over, they are currently in the studios working on their fourth LP.

At Club Bayhead in Providence a few weeks ago, they played a rocking set that included some new songs off their unreleased album. It is suspected that a similar set will be played at the Iron Horse.

Buffalo Tom played at the Student Union Ballroom last semester to an enthusiastic group of students bashing around in a mosh pit. Although the Iron Horse doesn't have the room to service a mosh pit area, dedicated fans can watch the show while enjoying one of the many appetizers or entrees the Iron Horse has to offer.

Buffalo Tom will be performing for their slew of adoring, die-hard fans at the Iron Horse, Northampton on Wednesday, March 10 at 8:30 p.m. Tickets are $7 and they are limited.

An entertaining Swing

By JON LUPO
Collegian Staff

The perplexing media campaign of Swing Kids may have you, like me, thinking this is a glossy hybrid of Disney's musical dud Newsies and the campy spy-jinks of Melanie Griffith and her creaky German accent of Shining Through.

It isn't. Swing Kids, marketing aside, is actually a lot heavier and well-acted than you'd think. There isn't much dancing, though, but Swing Kids manages to blend a tale of friendship, identity and the very real threat of Nazi hell on the horizon into an entertaining, but "Afterschool Special"-like mix.

The cast, headed by Robert Sean Leonard and Christian Bale, are actually quite believable in their roles. This stuff is strictly low-cal clap trap, but after sludging through the high-minded pretensions of Mad Dog and Glory, this brand of pop melodrama was just what I needed.

Leonard and Bale play teens in Germany with Nazism on the rise. They're part of a group of young adults who rebel against the Nazi movement by attending wild "swings" at night. Influenced by American movies and swing music, the kids dress to the nines and dance their troubles away.

In a silly turn of events, Bale and Leonard join the Hitler youth corps, re-signed to play by the "rules" by day and swing by night.

Little by little, though, the intense Nazi propaganda takes hold over Bale. Leonard still is reluctant, still feeling that something just isn't right with the direction the country is taking. But most everyone around him is falling under the Nazi spell. Soon Leonard's mother (Barbara Hershey) is being wooed by a Gestapo official (Kenneth Branagh, in a nasty, theatrical turn) and feeling more in touch with the Reich. Soon the questions of friendship and loyalty come into play and Leonard and Bale are stuck in the middle.

Granted, it sounds incredibly goofy; the kind of film where people say things like, "Who cares about the Nazis? Tonight I want to dance!" — but they don't. The dance hall sequences are few and far between, but when they come, they're surprisingly energetic. They have a kinetic, anything-goes kick to them and it seems more like a precursor to today's RAVEs than an antique jitterbug fest.

Daring chorale ensemble Chanticleer to perform

By JESSICA TAVERNA
Collegian Staff

"Sing, Chanticleer, sing!", were the immortal words uttered by the little green kitty in the animated film, Rock-a-Doodle.

Instead of being answered by an oversized, Elvis impersonating rooster, his beckonings have been received by a distinguished chorale group that goes by the same name. Chanticleer will be performing at the Bowker Auditorium on March 11.

Chanticleer's anticipated interpretation of Renaissance gospel, vocal jazz, and daring modern compositions certainly won't constitute as "kids stuff." With a selection of barbershop, folk songs, popular music, and a few choice classics, Chanticleer will offer a wide variety of musical influences on their agenda.

Such classics will include: William Byrd and Thomas Tallis' "Sing Joyfully if Ye Love Me," Alexander Agricola's "Magnificat," excerpts from Adriano Banchieri's "La Pazia Senile," Camille Saint-Saens' "Calme des Nuits les Fleurs et les Arbres," David Conte and Alan Shearer's "Ave Maria" from Ages of Day Noon Dusk and Mattie Moss Clark's "Jesus Come by Here Going to Heaven," arranged by Joseph Jennings.

Though the group was founded in 1978, it didn't really take off until 1984, when singer/composer/arranger Joseph Jennings became its music director. Since their 1984 debut, they've received major recognition in the United States. They're now looking at 80 concert dates throughout the United States and Europe.

Many may recall their 1991 Christmas Concert ensemble at St. Mary the Virgin Church in New York City which was broadcasted internationally via NBC's Preview.

They frequently appear on such radio programs as St. Paul Sunday Morning, West Coast Weekend, A Prairie Home Companion, and All Things Considered.

Chanticleer, the recipients of the highest chorale grants for the past four years, is guaranteed to offer a stunning performance.

Chanticleer will play Bowker Auditorium on March 11. Tickets start at $20, with half-price tickets for Five College students. Access and parking for the physically disabled is to the rear of the building.

The friendship storyline is well-done and credit the film for making the Nazi power a one-part seduction, two-parts muscle role, instead of the one-dimensional ogres we're used to seeing.

Still, Swing Kids needs a kick in the pants. There are avenues unexplored here and others that are simply underplayed. I would have liked to have seen more of Branagh's prickly performance, the relationship between him and Hershey and more of the swing kids' world.

As for Robert Sean Leonard, I still haven't forgiven him for offing himself at the end of Dead Poets Society (yeah, that was believable). He's pretty good here, considering the material, and he excels at the end quite well. This won't win him any awards, but hey, it could've been Keanu Reeves.

Christian Bale, dropping that god-awful accent he mangled in Newsies, is adequate in his underwritten role. While Swing Kids is by far Leonard's movie, Bale seems itching to stretch his acting muscles in a role that's clearly second banana.

Barbara Hershey looks pretty lost here, as if she wandered off the set of another movie. Kenneth Branagh, though, the director behind Henry V, Dead Again and Peter's Friends, injects the film with a malevolent streak every time he's on screen. A little tip of the hat to Harry Lime in The Third Man and quite entertaining to watch.

Swing Kids, as a whole, doesn't really have a point if you're aiming for depth, try Europa Europa, a much better Nazi-themed identity crisis. But for those who like their nostalgia a little rose colored and can appreciate how bad it could've been, Swing Kids is a reasonably entertaining night at the movies. Let face it folks, these days even achieving that is rare. C+ facial gel, and once a week I use a mud mask from the homeland (Israel). See that's all I do for my face. Oh, and then Nivea Post Shower Lotion and a few times a week I use Peppers of Boston Oatmeal and honey facial scrub." This person also commented "I like my face to be as smoothe as a baby's ass."

To top this off I asked around about people and tans. And the responses were surprising. Fake Bake, or Cancerama, those tanning salons are "so passe" as one student said. I asked around for quotes about men using tanning cream which darkens their skin, and unfortunately but not surprisingly they all shyed away because their machismo was at stake.

So remember, a splash of the right cologne, the right hair style, and the right look is your guide to achieving that campus man look.

UNFORTUNATELY, THIS IS WHERE PEOPLE ARE PUTTING TOO MANY RETIREMENT DOLLARS.

Every year, a lot of people make a huge mistake on their taxes. They don't take advantage of tax deferral and wind up sending Uncle Sam money they could be saving for retirement.

Fortunately, that's a mistake you can easily avoid with TIAA-CREF SRAs. SRAs not only ease your current tax-bite, they offer a remarkably easy way to build retirement income—especially for the "extras" that your regular pension and Social Security benefits may not cover. Because your contributions are made in before-tax dollars, you pay less taxes now. And since all earnings on your SRA are tax-deferred as well, the money you don't send to Washington works even harder for you. Down the road, that can make a dramatic difference in your quality of life.

What else makes SRAs so special? A range of allocation choices—from the guaranteed security of TIAA to the diversified investment accounts of CREF's variable annuity—all backed by the nation's number one retirement system.

Why write off the chance for a more rewarding retirement? Call today and learn more about how TIAA-CREF SRAs can help you enjoy many happy returns.

Benefit now from tax deferral. Call our SRA hotline 1 800-842-2733, ext. 8016.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Real estate deals and luxury purchases enjoy favorable influences. You are delighted with a new home or the sale of an old one. Make up your mind about goals and relationships.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): An office battle could inflict damage on everyone involved. Diplomacy and compromise will increase productivity and help mend fences. Go home early tonight.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Stop looking at the gloomy side of things and count up the positives. You may be able to turn a situation around if you try a new strategy. Get better organized this week.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Stick to your schedule even if it means shutting our a visitor. You must put first things first. Do not let a desire to impress someone burn a hole in your bank account.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Do not wait for someone else to take special steps. It is up to you to steer your own course. Postpone signing a legal agreement or making a major purchase.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): A good day for activities that really interest you. This includes looking at places where you could open your own business. Keep finance and friendship separate.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Take your time when deciding how to answer a demand. If you rush, things could get snarled up. A farewell may be temporary. Enjoy travel during spring break.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): A pay raise or promotion could make this a red-letter day. Keep abreast of world affairs. Intellectual endeavors will progress smoothly. Relationships you value need careful nurturing.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Unreasonable people should not be catered to or pampered. You have too much moral strength to knuckle under to irrational demands. Handle major tasks with dispatch.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Your popularity is on the upswing now. You may be the center of attention for several reasons. Inspect sales items before you pay for them; make certain they are worth the price.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): If you turn down an assignment today, your decision could be held against you. Think twice. Return phone calls and answer correspondence promptly.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 21): The trouble caused by a misunderstanding may be widespread. Try to make clear what you meant to accomplish. Good friends offer advice and encourage. Relax at home.

points, which may have pointed that UMass did have something extra to prove.

Williams picked up in the second half where Roe left off, and it seemed as if the two were battling each other, in a game-within-a-game. If Roe jammed home an alley oop, Williams would come back with a slashing drive in the lane culminated by his own slam. Williams finished with a 13 points and 11 rebounds.

"There was one reason why Harper was Player of the Year last year... He faced Lou Roe in practice every day," Calipari said. "It's a battle every day between those two."

Rhode Island (18-10), with the game much out of their reach in the second half, resorted to fouling — hard. Kyle Ivey-Jones clotheslined Dana Dingle in a move to the basket, and Damont Collins grabbed Derek Kellogg after Kellogg blew by on his way to an uncontested layup. In addition, Mike Brown was ejected for disparaging comments towards an official.

"I don't think they were too rough," Harper Williams said. "They just played a physical style of game, one that we've been accustomed to all year. It'll prepare us for the NCAA Tournament."

By playing hard in the first half for the first time in recent memory, UMass was determined not to let the scenario in Providence play out. Ivey-Jones, who scored 20 in the last URI-UMass game was held to 10 points and was not a factor, except of the distracting nature. After Abdul Fox had broken a three-minute URI scoring drought in the first half, Ivey-Jones was slapped with a technical for some trash-talking.

"I think we were a litt'e rushed in the first half," said URI coach Al Skinner. "They are an excellent team and once we got behind, we couldn't catch up."

and Brunson is averaging 13.5 points and 4.5 assists a contest, while playing 35 minutes a game.

In Temple's 80-53 destruction of West Virginia in the A-10 quarterfinals Sunday, Brunson once again threw no-look passes with ease, broke the press with his dribble and confidently buried three pointers, much like the Rick Brunson of Salem High.

"Without Rick Brunson we wouldn't be in line for an NCAA bid," Chaney said. "He has been invaluable for us this season."

Brunson said, "I just try to do what it takes for us to win. Last season was last season, just as last game was last game. I don't think about what happened in the past, just what I'm going to do in the next game."

It has certainly worked for Brunson, who was recruited by the University of Massachusetts, but said Chaney was the deciding factor in heading to Philadelphia.

"UMass has some good coaches, but I just felt Coach Chaney could make me the best player and person possible." Brunson said.

And to become the best sometimes a person needs to undergo growing pains.

"For some people things come quickly," Chaney said. "Mark (Macon) found success immediately. But Rick needed time to get there. Overcoming difficulties makes a person stronger. Life isn't easy but Rick is doing fine."

"Going South?"

EUNICE R. KONIECZNY STUDENT LEADERSHIP AWARD

The Eunice R. Konieczny Scholarship Fund was established in 1985 to annually recognize students who demonstrate a commitment to the vitality of the Student Activities Trust Fund at the University of Massachusetts. Student participation in out-of-class activities as a complement to academics involves personal development, leadership and team building, sensitivity to diversity, and advocacy for student needs and concerns. Award candidates must show how their participation enriches both their organization and by extension, the larger campus community. This award honors Eunice R. Konieczny, who provided over twenty years of dedicated service to the Student Government Association.

QUALIFICATIONS

1. Any undergraduate senior may apply provided that he/she is a current member in a Registered Student Organization (RSO) or the Undergraduate Student Government Association at the University of Massachusetts, Amherst, and has been a member at least one (1) year prior to applying.
2. A recipient must have a cumulative G.P.A. of 3.0 or above.

Applications are available in the Student Activities Office, Room 416, Student Union. Completed applications must be received by

ECACs end swimming

By ROBERT FERREIRA
Collegian Staff

For the University of Massachusetts women's swim team, six months of swimming officially came to an end Saturday when eight swimmers and two divers pulled the Minutewomen to a 10th place finish at the women's Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference at SUNY-Buffalo.

This was the first year that the ECAC held a swim conference and head coach Bob Newcomb said the team went in virtually blind.

"We didn't know what to expect or who to expect," Newcomb said. "Our goals were to represent UMass well, be a top-10 team and have everyone score, and we did just that."

Twenty-six teams were represented in the three-day battle that ended with Boston easily swimming away with the title, compiling 585 points. Lasalle placed second followed by Northeastern at third.

The University of Rhode Island, the team that squeezed out UMass for third place in New Englands, placed fifth, beating out the Minutewomen by only 48.5 points. In a close battle for the top-10 spot, UMass clinched it by a single point, compiling 224 points and leaving Fordham University sulking at 11th.

In gearing up for the ECACs the Minutewomen had to maintain a taper from New Englands. Newcomb said that usually a maintained taper doesn't produce times as fast as the original taper which for them was focused for New Englands. However, times proved to be just as fast as the Minutewomen scored points in every event.

Day one proved to be a good start with a fifth place finish and a season best time in the 200-yd. freestyle relay from Sarah Baker, Michelle Munyon, Lori Sheehan and Jessica Griffith.

Baker wrapped up her first season at UMass, sprinting career highs in the 50, 100 and 200-yd. freestyle events. Julie Veremey cut her way to the top landing a third and fourth place finish in the 400-yd. IM and 200-yd. butterfly, respectively.

Kim Broad swam a solid 1650-yd. freestyle dropping 15 seconds off of her time, finishing the one-mile swim at fifth place. Diver Allison White graced the ECACs with a six place finish on the one-meter board and will travel Thursday to Pittsburgh to compete in the Zone National diving competition.

An outlook on the playoffs

NOTES FROM THE HARDWOOD by Art Stapleton

For those readers who have just joined us, welcome to Notes from the Hardwood, the never-ending trip around the ranks of the NBA. Because of the A-10 Tournament, my full space has been pre-empted, but should be back in time for the playoffs.

Speaking of the playoffs, here are the matchups if the season ended today, and the hype I would provide for them.

Chicago (1) vs. Atlanta (8): Give me a break. Ask Dominique what happened the last time he went one-on-one with Michael at Chicago Stadium when it meant something (see 1988 Gatorade Slam-Dunk competition).

New Jersey (4) vs. Boston (5): Reggie Lewis is the best kept secret in the league. Wait a minute, he shouldn't be a secret. No Larry. No home court. No second round?

Cleveland (3) vs. Charlotte (6): If the Hornets could have gotten an easier draw, the chances of moving to the second round would have been higher.

New York (2) vs. Orlando (7): Shaq vs. Ewing. O'Neal's chance at revenge for the All-Star Game "benching." It is time for Patrick and company to put up or shut up.

Phoenix (1) vs. Clippers (8): Danny Manning wanted to be traded. Hmmmm. . . I wonder why.

Houston (4) vs. Portland (5): Now that Clyde the Glide is hurt, Portland is relying on Terry Porter from the outside. Does anyone remember the three-point shootout? One thing Portland shouldn't have to worry about: losing in the Finals again.

San Antonio (2) vs. Lakers (7): How could the Spurs lose by 41 points to Boston? The Lakers are working miracles with the talent they have, and should be a push-over.

Seattle (3) vs. Utah (6): By far the best of the bunch this season. Seattle's youth and depth versus the pick-and-roll of the Jazz. Shawn Kemp and the Mailman head on. Enough said.

Did you see that:

• Jimmy Jackson going back on his word never to play in Dallas.

Player of the Game

Lou Roe, 6-7 So. Center

Roe dominated the game from the start scoring 16 of his 24 points in the first half. The sophomore also held opposing URI centers at bay, collecting 9 rebounds and 2 blocked shots. Roe's tempo, and his willingness to play hard from the get-go, rubbed off on his teammates in the 76-50 drubbing

Why UMass won

The Minutemen took off to a 23-8 run and never looked back. UMass was not hassled down low as Loe Roe and Harper Williams had their way in the post. The Minutemen held Rhode Island to 32 percent shooting and a season-low 50 points, and they more than doubled the Rams on the boards (51-25).

UMass' next opponent

The Minutemen take on the Temple University Owls, who are the number three seed in the A-10, in Thursday night's A-10 Championship game at 9:30 p.m. at the William D. Mullins Memorial Center. The Minutemen and the Owls split the regular season matchups. Temple came away with a victory when they faced each other in the A-10 Final four years ago.

A-10 Tournament talk from Palestra

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

PHILADELPHIA — The Atlantic 10 Conference is assured of at least one NCAA berth, which will go to the Tournament Champion, the rest of the league's teams are positioning for at-large bids.

George Washington (19-8), once considered a sure bet for the tournament, may now find itself in the NIT after suffering back-to-back losses to Rhode Island. The Rams (18-10) defeated the Colonials, 75-72, in the regular season finale on March 4 and then beat GW, 86-75, on Sunday, in the A-10 quarterfinals.

"I don't know whether we'll get a bid or not," GW coach Mike Jarvis said. "I think we would be a good representative but I'm not sure what will happen."

Jarvis' team may benefit from the extensive media attention it has received this season. Freshman center Yinka Dare has proven to be a great marketing tool for George Washington, which is considered one of the hottest programs in the country.

"Losing on Sunday really hurt their chances but GW is still on the bubble," said Mike Kern, who covers college basketball for the Philadelphia Daily News. "Rhode Island probably moved ahead of them, but they are not a sure bet either."

The Rams have struggled at times, but have defeated Providence and Massachusetts this year and played Arizona and Wake Forest tough on the road.

"I think this [Sunday's] win gives us a great opportunity to get in," URI coach Al Skinner said. "I think the A-10 should receive five bids. GW should get in also."

Temple (16-11) and UMass (22-6) are most likely a lock, while St. Joseph's should also find themselves at "the Big Dance," according to Kern.

• The A-10 tournament is held at the historic Palestra on the campus of the University of Pennsylvania. While not the most modern of facilities, the Palestra is a true basketball landmark.

The scoreboard is run manually. The game clock actually ticks. The roof is partially glass and most of the seats are bleacher-style. There is even a banner honoring Penn's 1906 Ivy League Championship. Now that's history.

"This arena has the finest atmosphere for basketball of any in the country," Temple coach John Chaney said. "The last few season's we've played at almost every big arena in the country, but there is no arena that has basketball spirit that is in this arena.

"There could be only two fans in this arena and it would still be special," Chaney said.

Temple guard Aaron McKie, who grew up in Philadelphia, said the arena has special meaning to the city's youths.

"You always heard about the Palestra as the place to play," he said. "The Palestra has always been the basketball gym of Philadelphia."

Chaney says there is only one problem with the 8,000-seat arena, "It's on the wrong campus. It should be at Temple."

• One of the most intriguing stories of the season is West Virginia's inability to win on the road. The Mountaineers (16-11) racked up a 14-1 record in the 14,000-seat West Virginia Coliseum only to chalk up a miserable 1-9 road mark.

West Virginia coach Gale Catlett had no explanation for the disparity, but Chaney said the Mountaineer, WVU's mascot, which celebrates each West Virginia basket by shooting blanks out of a musket, may be the difference.

"They have that guy shoot the gun after they score," Chaney joked. "That's enough to scare me."

• ESPN is living up to its "In Your Face" slogan by having a camera crew follow UMass around for the remainder of the season. The Total Sports Network is filming team meals, film sessions, practices, bus rides and players' free time, in an effort to provide new insight on college basketball.

The cameras were rolling in the UMass locker room at halftime of Sunday's UMass-St. Bonaventure contest (29-29 score). Minuteman coach John Calipari unleashed a "spirited talk" about his team's poor first half play, but UMass center Harper Williams said it was unlikely the tape would be suitable for family viewing.

Brunson happy in Philly

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

PHILADELPHIA — When Rick Brunson signed a national letter of intent to attend Temple University two years ago, the former Salem (Mass.) High School star was expected to be the second-coming of Owl All-American Mark Macon.

Macon, a four-time first team Atlantic 10 selection, was set to take his considerable talents to the NBA. Brunson, a McDonald's All-American his senior year, was ready to step in.

Brunson, a skilled passer and defensive terror, racked up 1,768 points in his storied high school career which included winning a state championship in 1990. Owl fans figured Coach John Chaney had just reloaded. Out with the old, in with the new.

Initially, it didn't work out as planned. Brunson, a sophomore majoring in education, struggled on the court last season. He shot a miserable 32 percent from the floor; started only one game, averaged 4.9 points a contest and turned the ball over at a startling rate.

The comparisons to Macon, who was named second team All-American as a freshman in leading Temple to a 32-2 record and No. 1 national ranking, ended.

Brunson, so displeased with his situation at Temple, prepared to transfer to Boston College. Last summer he spent a month working on the Chestnut Hill campus, before changing his mind and returning to Temple.

"He made a mistake," Chaney said. "But he was mature enough to admit it. I wouldn't punish a kid for making a mistake, especially if he faces up to it. Adults make mistakes all the time and they don't even face up to it. That's why we always are at war."

Brunson will not discuss the supposed transfer, but said he is "happy" to be at Temple.

And the way Brunson has played during the second half of this season, Owl fans are ecstatic he returned. The 6-3 Brunson became the Owls' starting point guard when senior Vic Carstarphen broke his leg and his improvement has been steady since. Temple has won six of its last seven

Men's gym wins Open

Minutemen win fifth straight N.E. title

By ANDREW BRYCE
Collegian Staff

For the fifth consecutive year, the University of Massachusetts men's gymnastics squad won the six-team New England Open this past Saturday at Boyden Gym.

The Minutemen scored 248.35, easily defeating runner-up Springfield College by over six points (242.30).

Southern Connecticut finished third with 235.60, followed by Vermont (212.20), Massachusetts Institute of Technology (140.90), and Dartmouth (110.65).

The Minutemen had some good overall performances, namely Jay Santos. The junior co-captain finished fifth in the all-around (48.75), tied for second on the high bar (8.30), took third on the parallel bars (8.95), tied for fourth in the floor exercise (9.00), and tied for fifth on the pommel horse (7.65).

Steve Christensen, who as of last week was ranked third in the nation on the pommel horse, scored a season-low 8.90, still good enough to take first place in Saturday's meet.

Christensen also finished first on the parallel bars with a score of 9.10. Junior Jason Braud finished first in the floor (9.65), tied for first on the vault with teammate Jason Lee (9.00), took second on the parallel bars (9.05), and tied for third on the rings with teammate Stu Backer (8.90).

Another standout for UMass was freshman Jason Grant, who scored a 8.10 on the high bar and finished in fifth place. Head coach Roy Johnson was especially pleased with two of UMass' high bar competitors, they being Grant and Santos.

"On the high bar, we had some real bright notes," said Johnson. "Jason did a beautiful high bar set and broke into an 8.1, and Jay (Santos) had another good performance.

"We just have to get the other four guys to hit and then I think high bar could all come together."

The Minutemen (9-5) face Radford and Vermont tonight at 7 p.m. in Boyden Gym. Radford is the tougher competition of the two teams, scoring in the high 250s throughout this season.

This will be UMass record holder Steve Christensen's last home meet of his career, the lone senior on the Minutemen squad.

TEMPLE 71, ST. JOE'S 60

PHILADELPHIA — When Temple's record dropped to 9-9 in mid-February and coach John Chaney was without the services of senior starters Vic Carstarphen and Frazier Johnson, many people wrote the Owls off.

They were wrong.

Temple (17-11), winners of seven of its last eight contests, served notice it was still a force in the Atlantic 10 last night by dominating St. Joseph's 71-60.

The victory advanced Temple to the A-10 finals, where it will meet Massachusetts (22-6) Thursday night (9:30 p.m.) in Amherst.

The Owls were led by guard Rick Brunson (23 points), A-10 Player of the Year Aaron McKie (21 points) and Eddie Jones (19 points).

Temple's stifling match-up zone defense shut down the Hawk attack throughout. St. Joseph's (18-10) did not convert a field goal during final 11 minutes of the first half. Temple led 38-23 at the break.

"I think we'll do all right at UMass," McKie said. "We owe them one, the way we lost at the Cage."

Temple will be the first team to play at the Cage and Mullins in the same season.

Clinton frees $1.5b for plan to cut defense

By ROBERT BURNS
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Clinton is freeing about $1.5 billion to help companies, workers and communities adjust to defense cuts — a sign that he will push for a more active federal role in weaning the economy from its defense dependence.

The $1.5 billion is one piece of a broader, long-term effort by Clinton to demilitarize the economy and end the overwhelming focus on military uses of technology that prevailed during the decades of preparing for war with the Soviet Union.

Congress has tried for several years to increase the pace of this defense "conversion," but it was a philosophical bugaboo for Republican administrations, which argued that government should stay out of the way.

During the Reagan and Bush administrations their position was that. . . their job was fielding weapons systems, keeping the troops equipped, and that problems in the industrial base would be handled by the market one way or another," Sen. Jeff Bingaman, D-N.M., said in an interview. "Now I think there's a growing recognition that we need to do more."

The $1.5 billion was approved by Congress last fall but put on hold by the Bush administration. Clinton is taking steps to make the money available for spending.

As evidence that Clinton views defense conversion as mainly economic rather than military, he put his National Economic Council in charge of coordinating it. The National Security Council is involved, but not as the leading player.

A centerpiece of the $1.5 billion package is about $550 million to help defense-dependent companies — especially small and medium sized ones — develop products that they can sell in both commercial and defense markets.

One reason such "dual-use" products are not

GEO rallies to protest proposed contract changes

By TRACY MONAHAN
Collegian Staff

About 150 Graduate Employee Organization members rallied yesterday on the Student Union steps yesterday to protest administration proposals they say might lead to cuts in graduate employee benefits.

GEO's contract expires June 30 and the proposals they say they will continue to refuse include the replacement of health fee exemptions with stipend increases, the elimination of funding for eight GEO employees and the removal of research assistants from the bargaining unit.

"Welcome to the first rally of the year!" GEO co-speaker Jack Chang said.

Chang announced GEO's endorsement student trustee candidate Al Lizana. He also warned all speakers to be mindful of the press blackout, which prevents GEO and the administration from discussing contract negotiations with the press.

Lizana thanked GEO for endorsing his candidacy and said he would work with GEO and support their efforts.

"Slavery is over and no one should have to work without getting paid," Lizana said.

David Schaeffer, a GEO member, said other members must be willing to fight to make the administration aware that GEO is serious.

Health care exemptions are important to GEO members, GEO member Karen Adkins said.

"[The administration] denied the fact that many of us are real people with families to support and health care costs that aren't insignificant," Adkins said.

GEO Racial and Social Justice Chair Prasad Venugopal said he believes GEO should have more of an impact on campus diversity issues.

Gay supporters warned of parade confrontations

By MELANIE DESILVA
Collegian Staff

During last year's St. Patrick's Day March in Boston, Elizabeth Ann Donnelly was spat at, verbally assaulted, and had bottles and condoms hurled at her. Why? Because, she said, she was exercising her constitutional right to march.

Yet, given the current political tension surrounding gay issues, this Sunday's event is expected to make last year's march look like a kindergarten skirmish.

"This is a highly volatile situation," said Donnelly, a member of the Gay and Lesbian Irish of Boston, stressing the fact that the parade route will be roped off, and press clearance will be limited for the first time in the event's 92-year history.

Without the support of political or religious leaders, the 25 GLIB marchers will walk through South Boston on Sunday afternoon, proudly revealing their Irish heritage and their sexuality to a crowd of spectators.

"No political or spiritual leader has offered to march with us," Donnelly said, adding that even U.S. senators John Kerry and Ted Kennedy have failed to send letters of solidarity.

Concerned about the safety of Five College gay, lesbian, and bisexual students, Donnelly urged all GLB individuals to take extra precautions to insure their safety if they plan on attending the event.

"If students want to come, they should think," Donnelly said. "Go in a group, don't take your car into the area."

According to Donnelly, media exposure of Colorado's anti-gay amendment and the tension concerning gays in the military may combine with mild weather and alcohol to make it very dangerous for gay students to safely and openly show their support.

Don't wear pink triangles. Don't wear T-shirts that say Queer Nation," Donnelly said, stressing that gay students should try to appear as inconspicuous as possible.

Donnelly fears that soldiers from two area navy bases who are frustrated with Clinton's decision to lift the ban on gays in the military will spend their weekend leave at Sunday's celebration, and focus their aggression on the GLIB marchers.

To make the situation worse, the Christian Network is in the process of airing a "six part series on the evils of homosexuality", according to Donnelly.

Hosted by television evangelist, Pat Robertson, the shows are being aired throughout the Boston area, and may contribute to the high level of restlessness on Sunday afternoon.

Donnelly said she has been attempting to prepare herself for the hate she feels she will be surrounded by in Boston this weekend. "I've been getting ready for hate," she said. Wearing her gay Irish button in public, she watches people's homophobic reactions to her being lesbian. "I watch people hate," she said.

Rodney King testifies

Takes stand for first time since beating

By LINDA DEUTSCH
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Testifying for the first time about his videotaped beating by police, Rodney King calmly told a rapt courtroom Tuesday that he woke up the next morning "wondering what did I do to deserve that type of pain."

"My whole whole body was hurting me," King testified in the federal civil rights trial of four White police officers. "I was very confused. I know I had been beaten by police, but I wasn't sure about what happened, when it happened."

His dramatic testimony came a little over two years after the beating, which gripped the world and eventually plunged the city into three days of deadly riots.

Under questioning by Assistant U.S. District Attorney Barry Kowalski, King said he had seen the videotape "just a little over 10 times."

"It's sickening to see it," he said. "It make me sick to my stomach to watch it."

King, speaking calmly and slowly, had trouble answering some questions from Kowalski. Defense attorneys objected several times to Kowalski's questions as being too leading.

King said he remembered waking up in the jail ward of Los Angeles County-USC Medical Center the morning after the beating.

"Physically I felt horrible, in lots of pain. I just was wondering what did I do to deserve that type of pain," King testified.

But he added: "I know for sure I was attacked by police officers."

King acknowledged that the night of the beating he had been drinking while watching a basketball game on television, and he admitted to speeding — going about 75 to 80 mph — when he was driving before he was pulled over.

A convicted robber who served jail time, King said he was afraid he would be going back to prison.

"Mr. King, why didn't you pull over for that police car?" Kowalski asked.

"I was on parole, and I was scared of going back to prison," King answered.

He denied taking PCP or smoking marijuana before the beating.

The defense had set the stage for King's testimony from King and doctors that King tested positive for heroin and cocaine in the months after the beating.

But when doctors later took the stand, no drug questions were asked.

And on a distasterous stumble on cross-examination, defense attorneys opened the door to damaging testimony more common already is that the military imposes rigid technical specifications for products it buys — requirements that don't make economic sense in the commercial market.

About $160 million of the $1.5 billion is to be split between Commerce and Defense department programs designed to provide economic planning aid to communities hit especially hard by the closing of military bases or defense plants.

Some communities' vulnerability will be dramatized by the outcries likely later this week when the Pentagon announces a list of about 30 military installations around the country that it wants to close.

The rest of the $1.5 billion is for worker retraining, early retirement incentives for tens of thousands of military service members and civilian Pentagon workers and other programs designed to ease the transition for displaced workers. Congress is generally enthusiastic about such aid, but some have questioned parts of the program.

For example, the Defense Conversion Commission created by Congress to study the issues said last December that it doubted the value of a program that aims to turn former military personnel into teachers.

Men show support with ribbons

By JON MARCUS
Associated Press

WALTHAM — It was when a female friend was raped that Duke University senior Jason Schultz became involved in the student organization Men Acting for Change.

"I was very confused," Schultz said. "I had not been prepared to deal with that. There wasn't a male voice talking about violence."

On college campuses throughout the country, men like Schultz are trying to increase their awareness of issues such as rape, sexual harassment and other topics that have been largely in the domain of women's organizations.

At Brandeis University, while many of their peers spend spring break ogling women on beaches, some Brandeis University men will be sporting plain white ribbons in a quiet symbol of dissent .

The ribbons, representing opposition to sexual harassment and assault, first appeared in Canada after 14 women were killed at the University of Montreal in 1989 by a man who then took his own life.

Their message has spread south.

"Whether it's men's organizations, men's pro-feminist study groups or white ribbon campaigns, things have really started to pick up," said Steve Patten a graduate student at York University who coordinates activities on 40 Canadian campuses for the White Ribbon Campaign, based in Toronto.

"Men are taking more of a role in these issues," said Brendan Cohen, a sophomore who is spearheading the campaign at Brandeis.

"It's always been a crisis," said Cohen, who wears a ribbon in the lapel of his sports jacket. "It's just that recently, society has been more willing to address it in the open."

Students and educators say their colleges are ripe for change.

"On certain campuses there's a real sort of fraternity attitude," said Mike Magee, coordinator of the Canadian white ribbon campaign. "There's a subculture that propagated the idea that there's nothing wrong with this."

Colleges and universities are "probably the most prevalent place where that kind of problem exists right now," said Sean Foxley, a junior at the University of Oregon and director of that school's student organization Men Against Rape. "We've just attained this freedom of being away from our parents and doing what we want, but there's still this lack of maturity. It's on every campus I've seen."

Nearly 1,000 rapes were reported in 1991 to security officials at the nation's universities and colleges, according to figures released under new federal disclosure laws. Officials who deal with sexual assaults said the real number probably is higher.

Brian Ammons, a sophomore at North Carolina State University, said incidents of rape promoted him to organize a lecture series for men on gender issues.

"I just say on campus that the way the rape education has been handled really alienated men," he said. "Every time you hear discussions of rape issues, it's always women as survivors and men as perpetrators. There's never any place for men to have a positive role in dealing with this problem."

The lecture series Ammons helped to organize for men has covered issues such as dating a rape survivor.

"We're not saying there's anything wrong with sexuality, as long as it's a reciprocal situation with equal respect," said Jason McCray, a sophomore at the College of William and Mary.

Some insist this generation of young men is already more aware of sexual harassment issues than its predecessors.

"Male students that I work with have been sensitized in some ways that I wasn't," said Bob Haynor, a 38-year-old residence coordinator at the University of New Hampshire who plans a course for men on gender roles this summer. Members of some UNH fraternities also plan to don white ribbons.

"Some of it is also the fact that a lot of men in my generation have become used to feminism and the idea that violence against women is not something that is okay or natural," Schultz said.

Gov't overturns ban on flag condoms

By JON MARCUS
Associated Press

BOSTON — The U.S. Trademark Trial and Appeal Board has overturned an earlier decision banning a condom company from using an American flag shaped like an unfurled condom as its logo.

The Trademark Office refused in 1991 to register the design for Old Glory Condoms. Government officials said the loge would "scandalize or shock the conscience of a substantial composite of the general public."

But lawyers for the Provincetown based condom corporation argued that the trademark had been singled out for political reasons. They pointed out that other condom products had been trademarked with sexually suggestive names, and that the American flag was incorporated into logos of thousands of commercial products.

"The real scandal is not my trademark, but the fact the the examining attorney was more scandalized by the trademark than by the AIDS crisis to which I sought to respond," said company founder Jay Critchley.

Critchley has been selling condoms since 1990 in solid red, white and blue, and also markets T-shirts that have pockets in the sleeves for condoms. The logo bears the slogan, "Condoms with a conscience" and the company furnishes safe sex educational material.

The trademark appeals panel, in a decision handed down March 3 said it was impressed by Chitchley's "seriousness of purpose" and ruled the logo was "in no way" scandalous.

by Dr. Charles Aronberg, opthalmology chief at Cedars-Sinai Medical Center.

The line of prosecution and defense questioning led to this response by Aronson, who had said he believed King's multiple facial fractures were caused by baton blows.

"My examination indicated they were localized blows. Someone suggested it could be from a fall to the pavement. That is out of the question."

The defense has claimed King was never intentionally hit in the head.

UMass student beaten outside Munchy Store

By CHRISTINA ROTHWELL
Collegian Staff

University police reported that a University of Massachusetts student was beaten by four males last Friday night as he left Cance Residence Hall.

Jason Nietupski said the confrontation left him with a concussion, swollen lips and loose teeth. Nietupski said he declined medical attention that night and went to Health Services the next day.

After studying at the School of Management Nietupski said he left for Southwest at 11:38 p.m. Grabbing an ice-cream at the Hampden Munchy Store, Nietupski said he headed to the ramp near Cance. As he walked down the slope, Nietupski said he saw a group of men talking at the bottom of the ramp.

"I had a sundae in one hand, and my wallet in the other," Nietupski said.

As Nietupski walked by the group, he said one of the men, wearing a hood lined with grey fur, punched him in the mouth.

"I yelled, 'what did I do?' I handed out my wallet. 'Take my money,'" Nietupski said. "They didn't take my money. They just wanted to beat me up. I thought UMass was a safe place to be."

Nietupski said he turned himself on his front to protect his face and was hit three to four times in the back of the head.

"The first thing on my mind was getting out of there," Nietupski said.

Nietupski, saying the incident occurred around midnight, told the Collegian on Sunday that he could not remember what his assailants were wearing, except that one was wearing a hood lined with grey fur.

Later on that night Nietupski said he saw the same four people in the Malcolm X Center. A day later Nietupski, after discussing the incident with others, said he could remember a man about 6-feet-2 inches being in the group.

He said he called the police, but they did not get there until over an hour. Police said they received his call at 11:49 p.m. Friday night.

Worrying about the security on campus, Nietupski said if the ramp was lighted than perhaps he would not have been attacked.

Police Chief Jack Luippold said they are investigating the situation. No arrests have been made, police said. Police said because the victim was White and reported that his assailants were Black, the police Civil Disorders Unit was investigating the matter.

University officials said yesterday they do not yet have cause to believe it was a racial incident.

Democracy on march in China, says activist

By TOM KNIGHT
Collegian Staff

Chinese pro-democracy movement leader Shen Tong discussed his impressions of Chinese politics past, present and future before a large and appreciative audience last night in the School of Business Administration auditorium.

This was Tong's second visit to the University. He previously spoke here four years ago shortly after his escape from China after the brutal government crackdown at Tianamen Square.

> "All of us had a dream that every citizen would taste freedom. We tasted it briefly. The taste is sweet. We will taste it again with a transformed Chinese nation."
> — Shen Tong

According to Tong, the most important consequence of Tianamen Square was that for the first time, every Chinese citizen "began to question the legitimacy of the Chinese government."

Tong said that when the movement first began, he and his colleagues "were pro-reform, still believing in the old system. We were waiting for a Chinese Gorbachev but the massacre changed that."

Tong said he now advocates a free market economy with a strong social net. As an economic system in China, "Communism is dead" said Tong.

Tong related that many foreign visitors today are puzzled with what they perceive as political apathy on the part of the Chinese people.

According to Tong, their "apathy is positive because it means the people have given up on the current system."

Tong said many of his colleagues in China are "still politically active.

They are intentionally choosing non-confrontational issues like the environment and religion because it allows them to organize without fear."

Tong predicted that a free China will not undergo the balkanization currently going on in the former Soviet Union because "95 percent of the population is Chinese."

Tong said he was a proponent of "self-determination."

"All people have a right to determine the form of their government", said Tong.

How long before a new, more democratic regime takes over in China?

"As soon as the old men who control the government die out," said Tong.

"They are all in their '80s and '90s and in poor health." he said.

"It used to be the old eight. Now it's the old six. Two died last year," he said.

Tong spoke compassionately about his colleagues who remain in China "many in hiding, many undergoing forced reeducation, many in forced labor camps."

"All of us had a dream that every citizen would taste freedom. We tasted it briefly. The taste is sweet. We will taste it again with a transformed Chinese nation," said Tong.

Upon his return to China last year, Tong said he was able to contact some of his pro-democracy movement colleagues and said he was encouraged by their "strong sense of hope, even under such harsh conditions."

Quoting from a Chinese author, Tong said "Hope is like a path in the wilderness. At first it is not really a path but after more and more people walk on it, it becomes one. I am encouraged to see my colleagues repeatedly walking down this path."

Tong is currently a political sociology graduate student at Boston University and heads up the Democracy in China Fund.

Students cast ballots
Violations invalidate number of votes

By ALYSSA M. OWENS
Collegian Staff

Save for a flap over election procedures which resulted in the invalidation of an undetermined number of ballots, student election official Jon Aronson said yesterday's balloting in the student government election went smoothly with a high voter turnout.

Some commuter students' votes were invalidated after campaign literature was posted within 50 feet of the ballot box, said Aronson, chair of the Undergraduate Student Senate's Governmental Affairs Committee.

Ten or 15 minutes after the commuter students' polling place opened outside the Hatch cafeteria just before noon yesterday, allegations were made that voting procedures were violated.

The literature was removed and polling continued for about 45 minutes, Aronson said, until the poll shut down and all previous votes were invalidated.

"The signs that were up could have influenced the votes, so I have to invalidate them," Aronson said.

He said the students whose votes were invalidated may not vote again.

The commuter students' polls reopened a half hour later and voting continued without further incident.

Aaron Wilson, president of the UMass Cannibis Reform Coalition said he is "suspicious" of the election procedures being followed.

"My organization will be watching the ballot boxes like hawks," Wilson said. "If fraud is suspected, we will demand a revote."

The UMass Hemp Initiative, which appears on the student government ballot and asks students if they support legalizing marijuana use and possession, was submitted through petition by the UMass Cannibis Reform Coalition.

Regardless of the mishap, voting turnout was good, said Sen. Cam Tewksbury of the Governmental Affairs Committee.

"Anything that happened was taken care of promptly and things are going great," Tewksbury said.

"The turnout's been very good," said Sen. Pete Roaf, who ran the ballot box in Worcester Dining Commons last night.

"It's much better than the last election," said Roaf, who estimated that 300 people voted at Worcester Dining Commons during the first seven hours of the election.

"This is the heaviest voter turnout I've seen," said Senate Speaker Mike Poster, who was running the ballot box for the commuter area after the invalidations took place.

I'm really pleased students understand the importance of this election and its consequences and that they've taken the time to come out and vote, Poster said.

The student government election continues today with voting from 11 a.m. to 7 p.m.

Elections for student government president and student trustee are today and tomorrow from 11 a.m. to 7 p.m.

Two campus referendums are included on the election ballot.

One calls for ratification of the student government constitution. If passed by the student body, the constitution would move to the Board of Trustees for approval.

The second referendum deals with the UMass Hemp initiative and was submitted through a petition by the UMass Cannabis Reform Coalition.

Grad. students can vote for trustee from 10-6 only in front of the grad. lounge.

Leader of cult has dark side, says official

By LAURA TOLLEY
Associated Press

WACO, Texas — The increasingly volatile leader of a heavily armed cult vacillates from belligerency to peacemaker in negotiations to end a 10-day standoff, the FBI said today.

The FBI had been portraying the talks as positive but on Monday began discussing what it called "the dark side" of cult leader David Koresh, who claims his name is "the surname of God."

FBI agent Bob Ricks said today Koresh is moving along "two irreconcilable tracks" — one peaceful, one not.

Ricks said the FBI was ready for whatever force Koresh might use.

"We have sufficient firepower, if we chose, to completely neutralize this situation at any moment," Ricks said. "We do not choose to do that."

At least four of the Army's Abrams main battle tanks were rolled into position around the Branch Davidian compound Monday after Koresh boasted he had enough fire power to blow lighter armored personnel carriers "40 to 50 feet into the air." The 67-ton tanks do not have ammunition but offer protection for law officers.

The FBI said early in the siege, after four federal agents were killed in a failed raid on Feb. 28, that it was not planning to storm the compound. Ricks repeated that pledge today, as did Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms director Stephen Higgins.

"We're prepared to stay there for a long time. Indefinitely," Higgins said on NBC's "Today" program.

Two elderly women who came out of the compound with the children last week were released from custody, Ricks said. They were first charged with murder, but those charges were quickly dismissed and they had been held since March 2 as material witnesses. Ricks said they were released into the custody of a trustworthy person.

Koresh has told negotiators he has preparing for a fight since 1985 and at times seems eager to provoke another gun battle to fulfill his apocalyptic prophecies.

"We are ready for war," the 33-year-old cult leader and self proclaimed messiah was quoted by the FBI as saying.

Also today, a judge continued state custody of the 21 children who have been released since the stalemate began.

"GEO needs credibility on issues of racism and social justice," Venugopal said.

Job security is another issue GEO members say they are concerned with. According to Janet Hotch, chair of the Grievance Committee, many first-year graduate students are lured here by stipends that are taken away during their second year.

"The way I feel about job security is that right now we don't have it, we need it and we're going to get it," Hotch said.

GEO staff member Donna Johnson encouraged other members to spread the word about what the organization was about.

"There is power in numbers, we need your support and we need to be organized," Johnson said.

The crowd then marched on to Whitmore to speak with Chancellor Richard O'Brien chanting "What do we want? A contract. When do we want it? Now," and "We want a decent contract. We're workers. We're GEO."

After being denied access to the chancellor's office, members stuffed ballots under the door that said "I Support the Negotiation Team and Vote for my Rights!" The ballots also had boxes that could be checked yes and no to adequate health care, "real" job security, campus diversity and unacceptable concessions.

University spokesperson Karin Sherbin said she could not comment because both sides have agreed not to publicly discuss the subject or progress of the contract talks. She said both sides did meet on Feb. 24 and March 5 and will meet weekly.

Sherbin also said there is a provision in the contract that stipulates that the current terms will carry over until a new agreement is reached.

Court sets stage for grave injustice to women everywhere

E.C. THOMAS

Teresa Harris worked as a rental manager at Forklift Systems Inc. for two years — one of two female managers employed at the company (the other, the daughter of the president). Her job entailed bringing coffee to management meetings and retrieving coins from the front pants pocket of the president, Charles Hardy. If she wanted to negotiate a raise she wasn't to meet Mr. Hardy in his office, but at the Holiday Inn.

After two years of derogatory treatment and suffering from anxiety, Ms. Harris quit. But she didn't leave quietly, she filed a sexual harassment suit against Hardy.

It seems like a pretty straightforward case; after all the crude and demeaning comments Hardy made were in front of Harris' fellow employees. In fact, he didn't deny the details of Harris' case, only that he was "joking." (Joking?)

The judge found Mr. Hardy to be a "vulgar man" who "demeans the female employees at his workplace." Hardy's remarks were "inane and adolescent" and "a reasonable woman would have been offended" by him. Well, there you have it; he was found guilty, right? Wrong.

The judge found that the comments and actions of the defendant were not so deplorable that they would "seriously affect" Ms. Harris' "psychological well-being" or interfere with her "work performance" and that his behavior had not made Forklift Systems Inc. a "hostile work environment."

According to legal precedent, without finding these factors to be true, a judge cannot rule in favor of the plaintiff.

Exactly what constitutes affecting one's psychological well-being and a hostile environment? Comments like "you're a woman — what do you know?" and "we need a man as the rental manger" wouldn't affect Teresa Harris? Comments and conduct that demeaned and reduced her to an object of ridicule and humiliation wouldn't affect Teresa Harris' mental well-being? Comments and conduct that made Teresa Harris leave work crying and start drinking heavily — is not considered hostile? Comments and conduct that forced Teresa Harris out of her job — are not considered hostile?

What must a woman do to prove that demeaning comments affect her well-being? Pull her hair out? Become bulimic, alcoholic, schizophrenic, abusive? Enroll herself in a mental institution? What?

The story gets better. The Supreme Court has agreed to decide whether or not workers who sue for sexual harassment must prove that they were not only offended but suffered psychological injury. Well, its about time such a case be brought before the Supreme Court. After all, sexual harassment has finally come out of the closet of important, but not spoken about, issues. But who opened the door to said closet? Does Anita Hill ring any bells?

How can the Supreme Court, with Justice Clarence Thomas presiding on the bench, possibly hear this case and come up with an objective decision? How can Clarence Thomas look at Teresa Harris without thinking of Anita Hill — or at Charles Hardy without thinking of himself? This decision will seriously affect women in the workplace. How can he possibly make a judgement on what is proper behavior in the workplace for this man. . . when years ago he couldn't make the proper one for himself?

Irony — or injustice?

Hasn't Teresa Harris been through enough? Haven't women everywhere?

Housing may be left alone to play about on campus

Nathan CRICK

I used to have a show at this station called Naked Radio.

"Broadcast Policies:

"It is the policy of WOCH not to allow the broadcast of any questionable lyrics that may be deemed inappropriate listening for a person under the age of 12 between the hours of 6 a.m. and 10 p.m.

"If a complaint of inappropriate material broadcasted on WOCH is received by Housing Services, the HSCN head will call the DJ. . . the DJ is required to stop broadcasting of any offensive material. If he/she does not stop, the station will be shut down and the DJ will immediately be suspended from WOCH. DJ banter is not art; music is."

Like I said, I used to have a show there.

I wanted to denounce this forced alteration of the WOCH constitution by Housing Services as blatant censorship. I wanted to present this as a symptom of Housing's hypocrisy and continuing power trip against students.

I wanted to demand some kind of reasonable regulations to replace this carefully worded authorization for Housing to take over complete control of the student-run radio station.

There was something about this whole situation which really bothered me. As I wrote my first draft of this column, though, I realized it wasn't even the act of censoring this basement radio station of under 50 listeners that really ate at the back of my mind.

Yes, there were several rude and unprofessional people abusing their privilege of having themselves broadcast to a whole campus, but that still didn't give the excuse to punish the whole station in such an ignorant manner.

What I realized was that even if I had made the most eloquent appeal of First Amendment freedoms and the right of a student organization, I had no ground to stand on. The general manager wouldn't even have any ground to stand on. Do you know why? Because all the earth beneath us is under the ownership of this university, and the only thing we seem to be able to do is shout and wave our arms and think how much it all stinks.

On weekends we can't even walk around with an open can of soda in the dorms. This is just about the most childish and anal rules that a group of adults should abide by, but who can argue? We are bound to obey Housing's laws for two years or else we can take our education elsewhere. Of course, we could run for an area government. Then we could authorize a Pizza-vator and make neat posters.

WOCH is just another example of our inability as students to really have control over anything that goes on around this campus. Not only are the deejays not given the freedom to play what they want, but are not even given the luxury of arguing that what they say over the air is of any value. Housing has formerly defined the limits of art for us children, and "DJ banter" is not included.

If the University wants to run our lives, to tell us what to do and when, they can go right ahead. Time will eventually purge this institution of its enrollment and they will be left alone with their towers and their crumbling arena.

But if they think they can tell us what to believe and how to define what is of "social value," they have begun to cross over into a very dangerous subject.

I will not have my values defined by Housing or any other bureaucratic institution, and neither will anyone else on this campus.

So they can take their new constitution and file it with all the other worthless garbage they have contrived for the purpose of creating their utopian society. Regulations are an accepted part of society, but idiocy and condescension, I had hoped, would not play a role in them.

But forgive me, I'm simply bantering.

Candidate misleads community

Jennifer Fazzi, candidate for SGA president, stated in her editorial [Collegian, March 3] that she is "concerned about diverse campus issues." While discussing sexism and racism, she said she "would support programs to educate students as to the wrongness of such discriminatory acts."

However, Fazzi is associated with two of the most discriminatory organizations on campus. She regularly writes for the Minuteman, which serves as a forum for conservatives to spread their sexist and racist ideas.

She has also served as vice-president of the Republican Club, which blatantly displays anti-gay literature on its office door.

The SGA is more powerful than most students realize. It decides which student groups will receive funding and which will not. It is also responsible for such major decisions as having the Mullins Center built.

It is very important that we elect an SGA president who will be accessible to all students and their ideas.

Jennifer Fazzi, by associating herself with the most conservative faction of the student population, has shown that she is not truly representative of our diverse campus community.

Diverse SGA needs student input

This letter is written by a student government representative in an effort to dispel rumors and fabrications that the SGA is not interested in student issues. Although we have been in a state of internal disarray for several years, this is no longer the case.

Over the past year we have become a more diverse group of students encompassing many ethnic backgrounds and religious affiliations. Women have become a major force within the SGA and student empowerment is making a comeback. These are the realities of today but unfortunately the average undergraduate still thinks in the past. WAKE UP and work with student government to establish a more cohesive environment here at UMass. We are making an effort to communicate our goals and future plans with the distribution of a student government newsletter once a month.

As chair of the Public Relations Committee for the UMass Undergraduate Student Senate, I am making a pledge to all undergraduates to ignore rumors that student government is unrepresentative and oblivious to student issues, and lacks motivation to govern and represent the student body effectively.

As a dark-skinned Latino and a member of the SGA I can speak honestly by saying this is untrue, although for years the SGA has been fraught with infighting as has been overrun by strict political ideologies and yes, it has a "White man's club."

Today the student government reality is one of diversity and representation: of the 81 individuals who make up the Undergraduate Student Senate, 22 are students of color and 39 are women — 25 percent of the SGA are students of color as opposed to the 9.4 percent campus-wide and 48 percent are women. Even the average undergraduate can understand this concept of representation.

Student government has been advocating in front of the Board of Trustees on behalf of undergraduates in an effort to stymie the ever-increasing cost of this university, which incidentally has increased by more than $5,000 in the past four years.

Even when undergraduates viewed student government as "a joke" we were advocating for the reactivation of Legal Services' right to litigate on behalf of students, something they were prohibited from doing after they, with a student, sued the University and won.

On Tuesday and Wednesday, March 9 and 10, you will have the opportunity to vote in the student trustee and presidential election along with the student government constitution referendum.

If you live on campus vote at the dining commons, commuters vote in the Hatch and Greek Area residents in the Newman Center.

Vote and show your support for not only student government as a whole but the overall future of student activism and and empowerment on campus, because if you are an activity fee-paying student, you are technically a member of student government.

Tell us your concerns; we are here to represent you, the students. For more information about SGA, call us or come to room 420 in the Student Union.

"Joe Turner's Come and Gone"

By YOLANDA Y. BROWN
Collegian Correspondent

"Joe Turner's Come and Gone," performed in Rand Theatre on Feb. 25-27 and March 3-6, turned out to be three exciting hours of entertainment. With a well written script and a dynamic cast of actors and actresses, the play proved to be a big hit. Each character had their own special characteristics which were played out to the fullest.

This was a play originally written by August Wilson, who is also known for writing a number of plays, including the Tony Award winning Fences.

Wilson came up with the idea for Joe Turner's. . . through the stories his mother told him about his grandmother and some of her experiences migrating from North Carolina to Pittsburgh.

The play takes place in a boarding house in Pittsburgh in August of 1911, the year sons and daughters of freed slaves migrated from the deep and near South to cities in the North. Many of them, not knowing where they were going or where they would end up, were just going wherever their feet would carry them.

Two main characters in the play, Seth and Bertha Holly, played by Rick Scott Gordon and Ingrid C. Askew, were the owners of a boarding house in which they housed these migrating Blacks. Many Blacks had to stay in boarding houses because they were the only places they were allowed to stay. With no predominately Black areas and very few Blacks being accepted in the White areas, many of them had no choice. Bertha was very welcoming and hospitable to the boarders. Seth, on the other hand, was more cautious and cared more about getting his $2 a week than anything else.

Joe Turner was a White man who would go around and gather up Blacks, get them involved in a game of craps and then get them arrested. He would use these Blacks to work for him on state-run agricultural camps.

Herald Loomis, played by Timothy E. Blake, was one of the borders who had fallen into the hands of Joe Turner. When Herald was captured, he was separated from his wife, whom he tried desperately to find throughout the rest of the play.

The great direction and meshing of these characters can be accredited to Nefertiti Burton, a student here at UMass. She did a splendid job putting this play together and should be acknowledged.

This play gave the audience a realistic look at what migrating Blacks had to go through in the 19th century. Even though it might leave some unanswered questions, it was still an exhilarating performance by all of the actors and actresses. Anybody who missed this play, missed out on a well-written, well-directed piece of work.

The harsh reality of Haiti as seen through a student

Seventeen months after a bloody military coup toppled the democratically elected government of Rev. J. B. Aristide, the reign of terror has not ended.

Ever since the coup, my family here has tried to convince my cousin, Mousse Andre, to leave Haiti, but he refused. His last words to us were: "I will not leave my country, I prefer to die!" A week later, he was arrested, tortured, shot six times, and his body was thrown in front of his house.

Why? Because he voted for democracy and was a supporter of Aristide. He left two children and a wife.

Would he have lived if he had tried, like other Haitians, to leave the country? No, not really. He would have been sent back to Haiti where he would have suffered the same end.

Think about the thousands of Haitians who, unlike Andre, sought asylum in the United States because they believed they would be safe here until democracy is restored.

Moisse
TIRADO

Mousse's death confirms my belief that President Clinton is wrong to continue the Bush policy of returning Haitians to Haiti, and wrong to play with terms such as "ECONOMIC REFUGEES" and "POLITICAL REFUGEES" when people like Mousse are being killed

Economic Refugees are people who leave their country because of harsh economic situations. Political Refugees are people who leave their country because their lives are in danger due to their political beliefs and affiliations. Had Mousse taken his family's advice, he might still be alive.

Haiti does have economic problems. In fact, for the past 40 years, the country has been in economic ruin. Yet, never before in Haiti history have so many Haitian's left Haiti, 40,000 in less than six months after Aristide's overthorw.

What about those who came in the early 1980s you may ask? Well, from 1980 to 1989, about 5,500 Haitians came to this country by boat. This amounts to about 611 per year or 51 Haitians a month. Whereas 40,000 have left Haiti by boat to come to Florida in the past 17 months, or 2353 a month! Why such a drastic increase when the economic conditions are basically the same?

A new Haiti

President Aristide, nicknamed "Titid" by the people, was a priest who was sanctioned by the church because he preached against the injustices, the corruption and the exploitation of Haiti. Before he became president, he was the subject of five assassination attempts, one of which happened while he was giving a mass. Twenty people died.

The seven months that followed his inauguration as president of Haiti was the most productive, dignified, corruption-free and hopeful time period for Haiti in 40 years. Haitian professionals, and non-professionals, who lived and worked in the United States for 15 and 20 years were returning to Haiti to help.

Most Haitians, whether in Haiti or abroad, had a new hope and a new pride and were determined to help their elected government. In Boston alone, Haitians, out of their own pockets, sent $3 million to Aristide's government during his first four months in office. Throughout the world, donations were sent by Haitians of all walks of life.

The country was not improving economically, but Haitians were not being killed and tortured. They believed in their government. The poorest people were helping by volunteering to fix roads, clean the streets and build schools. Seven months later, an investigation by "Human Rights in Haiti After the Coup" found that those who could no longer profit from corruption paid $40 million to the military to topple the Aristide's government.

Haiti betrayed

In less than two weeks, more than 2,000 unarmed civilians were killed. Journalists, priests, professors, students, mothers, young and old, everyone who was known to openly support the democratic government, was rounded up, tortured, raped and sometimes executed.

Headless bodies and mass graves were discovered throughout the country. Yet, ONE MONTH AFTER THE COUP, NO HAITIANS LEFT HAITI. They believed that the United Nations and the United States would bring their beloved and democratically elected government back. When they realized that no help was coming, only then did they start to leave the country.

About 20,000 escaped to countries such as the Dominican Republic, Cuba, Trinidad and Jamaica. Countries whose economies are no better than Haiti's. Haitians were running for the their lives and even if leaving by boat seems risky, at least as one of them put it, "We had a fifty-fifty chance to stay alive." It is estimated that 50,000 Haitians left for Florida, but that about 10,000 died at sea.

A journalist who was severely tortured and suffered internal bleeding is now close to blindness in New York. Another who spoke last semester on this campus at the invitation of the Haitian American Student Association is now the target of harassment in Haiti. We expect at any time now to hear he has disappeared or has been found dead.

The fear is real and very close to home to many of us Haitian students here. Those of us who choose to speak out know that if we return to Haiti right now, we could possibly lose our lives.

The Clinton administration, if it continues to follow in the steps of the Bush Administration, should be regarded as an accomplice to the Haitian Holocaust. Mr. Clinton said that repatriation must continue, otherwise, "We would be consigning a very large number of Haitians in all probability to some sort of death warrant." For us Haitians, Mr. Clinton is simply saying that he does not want us to die at sea, but dying at home is O.K.

America has a moral duty to deplore the policy of returning Haitians to Haiti. Repatriating Haitians will not stop them from fleeing the country, only the restoration of democracy will. If Democracy is restored and Aristide returns to Haiti, Haitians will voluntarily go back. They have said so themselves.

Mr. Clinton said that Haitians who want to apply for political asylum must go to the U.S. embassy in Haiti. That embassy is one block from the biggest army barracks on the island! Do you think a person the army is looking for will be crazy enough to stand in line, in plain sight on the street where he or she can easily be shot or arrested?

I implore everyone reading this article to write to President Clinton and the United Nations and ask them to restore the democratically-elected government of Aristide. It is the one and only effective solution that will stop this mass exodus and put an end to the Haitian Holocaust.

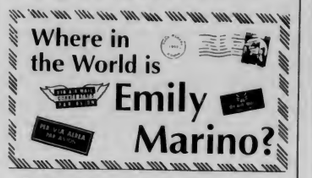
Emily defends American honor

SIENA, Italy — I never thought that I would have to travel 6,000 miles away to realize just how much I appreciate my country, but three hours a day in a classroom of international students has practically got me whistling "Yankee Doodle."

From 9 a.m. to 12 p.m., 26 students from all over the world fill the chairs of Professor Franco Biotti's classroom at the Universita Per Stranieri in Siena, Italy and learn Italian. We come from Astrailia, Canada, China, Germany, Greece, Guatamala, Ireland, Senegal, Japan, Malaysia, Puerto Rico, Taiwan and of course, the good 'ol USA.



Day in and day out we trudge through pages of exercises in grammar, read Italian newspaper articles, watch Italian films and try to carry on intelligent conversations amongst ourselves. Most of these activities are tedious yet helpful and, with the exception of the speaking aspect, they are also virtually stress-free.

However, with the help of Prof. Biotti's encouragement, and in between his cries that translate maybe "[Try] kids!," we speak Italian.

One of Biotti's strategies to give us practice speaking with continuity and some kind of higher thought process is to make each of us give a 10-minute presentation about our country. Not only does this (according to Biotti) improve our ability to communicate our ideas in a well-structured manner, but allows us to learn about one another and our respective countries. Learning from each other this way, theoretically, helps to eliminate misconceptions and stereotypes about people of various nationalities.

While Biotti's plan has proven successful in helping me to realize that we, as college-age students and human beings aren't that different despite our diverse backgrounds, it has also shown me what an incredible fascination most of my classmates have with the United States.

One American woman presented the political correctness movement in the United States. Now, to put the following story in perspective, two things must be understood.

First of all, the class' language ability is probably comparable to that of an average 9-year-old native speaker. This dictates that our comments are usually simple, blunt and lacking both eloquence and finesse. There is really no way for us to cushion our often strong opinions and sometimes crude comments. Often the points we make are not intended to be delivered as forcefully as they are.

Secondly, as hard as he tries to recognize us and individuals, Biotti often associates us with where we live. I don't know if he simply forgets our names (except mine which, for some reason he uses in almost every example he writes on the board for the entire class to admire) or if he prefers to think of us as this twisted model United Nations. In any case, this way of identifying students makes it difficult for us not to be aware of our respective nationalities when we interact.

So, here we are, a microcosm of the world, discussing P.C. via our 9-year-old vocabularies. The U.S. student finishes her speech and is immediately met with opposition.

Germany expresses his belief that P.C. is merely a way to cover up inequality and prejudice. Ireland pipes in that her experience one summer waiting tables in Pennsylvania verified Germany's assertion.

Senegal has enough courtesy to ask the United States if racism is as large a problem as he had heard, which inspires Germany to start in on how the United States is far more interested in conquering the world than solving the problem of racism.

Malaysia adds that because of their ignorance, most Americans need Vietnam as a reference point to know where her country is.

Meanwhile, various representatives of the United States are chiming in with agreement, disagreeing or rolling their eyes.

At this point, Biotti interrupts to remind us that

By EDWARD W. HUMPHRIES
Collegian Correspondent

Well UMass, once again its time to delve into the variety of featured flicks that the Housing Services Cable Network has to offer you this coming week. For the minions of you that are headed to downtown sunny Daytona a few days early, this list probably holds nothing of interest to you. But for those left to labor through a two-day labyrinth of lectures, perhaps I can alert you to some cinematic diversions which should help pass the time until you can leave this flu-ridden campus behind for sunnier venues.

Whether you crave big-budget extravaganzas like Indiana Jones and the Temple of Doom or art house favorites like the whimsical Cinema Paradiso and the stylish gangland drama Miller's Crossing, HSCN has a multitude of motion pictures all for the viewing, so hold out a few days longer and enjoy this current cornucopia of cinematic delights.

The Adventures of Baron Munchausen — This cinematic tall tale from the hands of Monthy Python alumn Terry Gilliam is an ingeniously original and visually appealing film. The story concerns itself with the fantastic adventures of the boastful title character as he races from the belly of a sea monster to the craters of the moon in search of a host of past acquaintances to help protect his kingdom from an invading army of Turks. Although the story is slightly convoluted this small problem is alleviated by inventive special effects and a cast of cameos including Uma Thurman, Eric Idle and a manic Robin Williams as the King of the Moon. A-

Alien 3 — Sigourney Weaver returns as Ripley who after surviving a horrific battle with bloodthirsty alien' invaders is confronted with a nightmare that keeps going and going and going like some deranged Energizer bunny commercial, this time detecting another-worldly presence on an asteroid penal colony inhabited by murderers, thieves and rapists. Marking his feature film debut, director David Fincher creates a depressing tale of redemption in the guise of a horror film. Though mired by poor sound, this film is redeemed by a surprising plot twist and is otherwise an engaging end to a thrilling sci-fi series. B

Beverly Hills Cop — This film, almost a decade old, remains a grand showcase for Eddie Murphy's comedic talents and after a series of recent flops including the dreadful Distinguished Gentleman, stands as a hallmark to the genius of Eddie's past. Murphy waltzes through this 'fish out of water' action comedy with remarkable ease, implementing his big city Detroit hot shot cop persona to take aim at the nouveau rich of Beverly Hills. Directed by Martin Brest (Scent of a Woman), this film is fast and funny and boasts good performances by Murphy and Judge Reinhold. B+

Cool World — Animator/Director Ralph Bakshi's ripoff of Who Framed Roger Rabbit faded quickly from theaters last summer with good reason, its a dreadfully unfunny mix of live action and poor animation, further drained by devastatingly bad performances by Gabriel Byrne and Kim Basigner as the reanimated cartoon Holli Would. The plot is a muddled mess centered around Holli Would's quest to be real and free from the animated dimension Cool World, which can only be fulfilled through consummating her passions with a member of the real world, Gabriel Byrne. Sound ridiculous? It is! The ads for this film screamed "Holli Would If She Could!" As for viewing this movie, Don't!! F

Die Hard — Though last year's Under Siege co-opted this film's formula and hit big, this film remains an uncontested action-adventure classic and for good reason, at the center of this furious roller-coaster ride of a film is a taut cat-and-mouse thriller which begs the viewer to come along for the ride. In his post-"Moonlighting" stint, Bruce Willis makes a good action hero as the lone NYPD cop John McClane struggling to reconcile with his estranged wife while fending off an invading armada of terrorists in a high-tech LA high rise. Amidst the rising body count and massive explosions, Alan Rickman nearly steals the show as the head terrorist carrying out the heist of a lifetime. A-

The Fisher King — A delightful film from start to finish, Terry Gilliam has created a clever drama focusing on the quest for the Holy Grail in modern day Camelot, New York City. Robin Williams scores with a daring performance as the homeless Perry on a quest for his sanity and Jeff Bridges is superb as the burned-out shock jock Jack who has a grand stake in Perry's past. A-

Indiana Jones and the Temple of Doom — Stephen Spielberg leaves the Nazis behind and places his intrepid hero Indiana Jones (Harrison Ford) in a search for the kidnapped children of an Indian village and the mighty power of the Sankara stones in this prequel to the audience pleasing thrill-ride series. Though criticized for being darker and more violent than its predecessor Raiders of the Lost Ark, this film entertains on a big scale and offers the usual roundup of extended action scenes and scores of insects. B+

Single White Female — Bridget Fonda and Jennifer Jason Leigh star in this variation on the house guest-from-hell genre. Featuring stylish direction by Barbet Schroeder (Reversal of Fortune) this film looks nice, but the script doesn't tread new ground and the film ends up being a nicely photographed slasher film (a genre which should have died with the Reagan era). Fonda is good as the SWF put upon by psycho Leigh but a lack of originality and a drought of suspense slash all interest in viewing this film. C

Big Top Pee Wee — Paul Rubens (in pre-mug shot days) dons his alter-ego Pee Wee Herman in this loose but fun sequel to the inventive Pee Wee's Big Adventure. Though not as funny or clever as that Tim Burton directed film, Big Top Pee Wee still manages to amuse. Among popular attractions in this cinematic circus are two love interests for Pee Wee (is that legal?) and a talking pig named Vance who nearly upstages Pee Wee's antics. Valerie Golino and Kris Kristofferson co-star as members of a circus which quite literally "blows into town." B

Also playing this week but not reviewed are Avalon, The Emerald Forest, Extremities, The French Connection II, The Great Gatsby, Love Crimes and Neighbors.

the reason for having the discussion is to share ideas and learn rather than to engage in a war-like series of personal attacks. This comes from the man who practically put the pistols in our hands by metaphorically strapping flags across our foreheads.

Everybody was so eager to criticize the undeniable social problems in the United States and conclude that America is far from free without understanding the complex issues behind these problems.

The passion with which my classmates debated our social and political issues was contrasted by the lack of knowledge and/or willingness to discuss the same problems within their own societies.

It seems to me that people everywhere love to argue about our country because they have access to information through the media. It is a fact that no nation escapes such problems, but whether or not these issues are recognized or allowed to be discussed is not as clear-cut as in the United States. We acknowledge and discuss our shortcomings and struggles, and although we have not succeeded in solving them, we claim them as ours to work on.

My classmates' disgust was just with respect to the hate embodied in many of America's dilemmas. However, they failed to recognize or perhaps accept that this hate is universal.

While I am not yet ready to wrap myself in stars and stripes nor paint "Made in the USA" all over my body, I really do believe that it is a privilege to be an American.

For, as many nasty things as anyone, including Americans, have to say about our country, we at least have the power and right to form and express our own opinions and responses to the sometimes just criticism.

We cannot deny this right and responsibility as citizens of the United States. In many way we are always under the curious, watchful scrutiny of other nations looking to jump on one bandwagon or another with regards to some issue being discussed or exposed by the media.

In light of this, nor can we deny our rights as Americans to do, feel and say the things that capture the world's attention.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Be careful in whom you place your faith. A business offer could be "fools' gold". A make sure you are given the real thing. You get a second wind in the professional front.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): A willingness to learn new skills will increase your earning power. Begin self-improvement projects. Proceed with caution when discussing delicate personal matters.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): The workday passes quickly. Do not let outsiders intrude on your privacy. Check your bank balance before purchasing a luxury item. An absorbing hobby is a surefire antidote to boredom.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Use specialized knowledge to advance your career. A promotion or raise is inevitable. Believe in yourself and other people will follow suit. Spend the evening with close friends.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Try to be more generous with your time and assistance. Profits from financial transactions are greater than expected. Pay less attention to your mate's or partner's faults.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Make better use of your time by reassessing your priorities. Give the boot to outdated procedures. Parting with an old friend may be painful. Work at widening your social circle.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Avoid trouble with business associates by working quietly behind the scenes. A conference may hold a special message regarding the future. Refuse to by trapped by the past.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Seek sage advice to avoid making the wrong decision. Rather than turn to a friend, talk with experts. Giving work your undivided attention will prevent mistakes.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): From start to finish, today promises to be highly memorable. Social invitations, short trips, meetings and errands leave you both exhausted and exhilarated.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): A confidential meeting with a VIP can greatly improve your prospects for business or financial success. You are on top of a family or property matter. The social whirl holds new appeal.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): An old friend could re-enter your life. It will seem as if you have never really been apart. If secretly planning certain home improvements, unveil your ideas at the right moment.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Those thinking of starting a new business should seek expert advice. An influential associate or banker can provide the backing you need. Be friendly to your co-workers and business associates.

Men's swimming places third in ECACs

By KEVIN HERLIHY
Collegian Staff

Over the past weekend, the University of Massachusetts men's swimming team swam in the ECAC Championships at SUNY-Buffalo, beat the two schools it finished behind last year, and still finished third.

James Madison (584.5 points) and La Salle (502), both new to the ECAC after leaving the Eastern Seaboard Ivy League last year, bested the Minutemen total of 415 points. Host Buffalo and Bucknell, who finished one and two last year, finished four and five this year.

UMass finished 11-1 this year with a national ranking of 30.

"I am pleased with third," said UMass coach Russ Yarworth. "With the swimmers we've got and the sport we play, it's probably as well as we realistically could have done. I think that with a little better mental preparation we could have done better, but we focused on the New England Championships (which they won two weeks ago), so the ECAC was gravy.

"It's not only mental preparation," he said, "but the physical preparation. We keyed on swimming our fastest at New Englands, but it's hard to keep that edge for two weeks. Also, the emotional peak we had at New Englands was hard to match."

Two UMass swimmers captured ECAC championships. Senior Jay Peluso's time of 4:01.47 in the 400 Individual Medley garnered one first place, while sophomore Tim Milbert's time of 2:06.20 earned him the title in the 200 Breaststroke.

The Minutemen also set four UMass varsity records: Sean Clark, Tim Nubar, Peluso and Adam Reich teamed for a 3:26.78 400 Medlay Relay; Clark, Milbert, Nubar and Aaron Osborne swam a 1:34.14 200 Medley Relay; Jeff Wicklund, Travis Stevens, Chris Barrett and Reich swam a 6:50.42 in the 800 Freestyle Relay; and Milbert swam a 57.62 in the 200 Breaststroke.

Also, Chris Antonetti swam a 1:55.29 in the 200 Butterfly to establish a new UMass freshman record.

MEET NOTES: "On Saturday I saw the toughest performance by any team I've ever coached," Yarworth said. "They came out and they were sore and tired and wanted to go home, but they knew they had a job to do. So they swam as tough as hell. Even if they didn't do their best times, they gave 100 percent. And that's what UMass swimming is all about."

on the vault, a 9.10 on the bars, 9.50 on the beam, and a 9.60 on the floor.

Zavotka, who along with Keels has been improving meet by meet all season according to Mitchell, scored career bests on the beam (9.40) and floor (9.25) along with a 9.10 on the vault.

May scored a career best 9.70 for her performance on the beam, culminating the mix for UMass. Angela Jent scored a season-high 9.55 on the vault for the Minutewomen.

"What we need to do is to be able to prove that we can perform well and consistently with anyone in the lineup. No one can accuse us for not having depth, because we could pull people out of the hat," said Mitchell.

The second ranked Bulldogs of Georgia won the meet with a whopping 197.55, followed by Penn State (193.15) and West Virginia (188.25). UMass returns home for a meet tonight at 7 p.m. in Boyden Gymnastics Center against Northeastern.

I know I picked on Michael Eisner and the expansion Mighty Ducks last week but this epidemic is getting worse. Not only have they decided to name the Anahiem arena "The Pond," but plans are in the works to distribute "Duck Calls" to fans to be blown when the Ducks score (probably not very often). Michael Eisner is a quack.

Thanks to ABC's deal to cover five NHL playoff games, it will finally be possible to see a hockey game on campus.

year coach has tried to place more responsibilities on Roe.

"Before the URI game, coach took me aside and told me he needed me to play well that night and how important me coming to play would be," Roe said. "Right then I put my game face on. I didn't break a smile the rest of the night."

In high school, Roe said he felt butterflies every time he stepped out on the court. It helped him to be named "Mr. Basketball" in the state of New Jersey his senior year.

"In high school, I was one of the most dominating players in New Jersey," the Arts & Science major said. "Usually the most dominant players will come out confident, but I had butterflies every game, even though I knew I was the best player."

Roe averaged 26.1 points and 15 rebounds a game his senior season and attracted the attention of college coaches throughout the country. Wooed by Florida State, Clemson and Syracuse, Roe came to Massachusetts, because Minuteman coach John Calipari did not attempt flatter him.

"A lot of coaches tell you what you want to hear, just so you feel good," Roe said. "They come in and promise you playing time and tell you how you are going to be in the NBA.

"Coach Cal didn't promise any starting positions or even any playing time," he said. "He said I would have to earn every minute of time. He would see me play in high school and he would criticize my game and tell me I was not ready for the NBA, unless I was ready to work."

At the time, UMass was still a somewhat unknown program and Roe's decision to come to Amherst was questioned.

"My friends were saying 'UMass what?' and 'How could you pass up Florida State for that?'" Roe said. "But then we started getting on TV and we went to the NCAAs, so now they are all fans."

Roe said Calipari reminded him of his parents, because he held his ego in check.

"I saw a little of my mom and my dad in him," Roe said. "They also were always telling me I had a long way to go and how I would need a degree if I didn't make the NBA. Coach Cal emphasized that also."

The NBA does not weigh heavily on Roe's mind at this point.

"I'd have to work really hard on a lot of aspects of my game to make the NBA," Roe said. "That's two years away anyway."

What is more appealing to Roe is Thursday night's (9:30 p.m.) Atlantic 10 Championship game against Temple, the upcoming NCAA Tournament and the Minutemen's future the next two seasons. A future Roe will be a major part of.

"This program is on the rise," Roe said. "We get national exposure, a new facility and each year we get better and better players coming in."

Roe said he is looking forward to playing with UMass freshman Donta Bright, an academic non-qualifier this season and UMass signee Marcus Camby, a 6-foot-11 center from Hartford, Conn., next season.

"We're going to keep getting better," Roe said. "Our teams the next couple of years are capable of accomplishing a lot."

Right now, Roe wants to capture a second straight Atlantic 10 Conference Championship by defeating a surging Temple team at the Mullins Center.

He knows the butterflies need to be present for him to play with the intensity his team expects of him.

"I think the butterflies will be there," Roe said. "I know those guys on Temple are pretty good. They are big and strong and if I don't come to play, they will destroy me. That game will depend on who wants it the most."

It may also depend on butterflies.

Lemieux's comeback is an inspiration to all

It seems like the big news in the NHL this season has been the return to action of injured stars. Eric Lindros, Cam Neely and Wayne Gretzky have all returned to action after much fan anticipation. But the biggest comeback story, has to be the return of Mario Lemieux to the Penguins' lineup less than 24 hours after his last radiation treatment for Hodgkin's disease.

The NHL was shocked when their biggest star announced that he had been diagnosed with the disease in early January. Although the disease was said to be neither life nor career threatening, many hockey insiders believed that Lemieux's season would probably be finished. Never underestimate Super Mario.

Only two months after Lemieux was sidelined, the Penguin superstar returned to the ice. In his first game back, Lemieux notched his 40th goal and added his 66th assist in the Penguins 5-4 loss to the Flyers. Lemieux's return comes none to soon for the Penguins who have been slumping badly without him (2-7-1 in their last 10 games).

With Lemieux in top form, the Penguins are the favorite to "three-peat" as Stanley Cup champs. Without Lemieux, Pittsburgh can be beaten by anybody as shown by recent losses to Ottawa and Tampa Bay. The question in Pittsburgh is: after the two-month layoff, will Lemieux be in top form for the playoffs?

Around the NHL

The Calder Trophy (rookie of the year) race is all but wrapped up. The Winnipeg Jets' Teemu Selanne has taken the NHL by storm. He broke Mike Bossy's record for most goals by a rookie when he notched his 54th last week. He is only 11 points shy of Peter Statsny's record of 109 points as a rookie, which barring injury he will surely pass.

The preseason hype focused on the much heralded rookie Eric Lindros. There was talk before the All-Star game that Toronto's Felix Potvin or Boston's Joe Juneau would challenge Selanne for the Calder Trophy. But Selanne has been on a tear since the break assuring himself the award.

His 56 goals (second in the NHL) and 42 assists have been particularly impressive because other than Selanne, the Jets don't have any other accomplished offensive threats. Forty four percent of the Winnipeg offense has been created by Selanne. Teemu Selanne is a star on the rise. Watch for him.

It was one of the most anticipated matchups in recent memory. Neely versus Ulf. The confrontation was enough to make Don King's mouth water. Well, it's going to have to wait. Swelling in Neely's knee, and a possible one game suspension for Samuelsson (for stick fighting with Mark Messier) will postpone this match-up until at least March

• Somewhat overlooked in the de-horning of the Rhode Island Rams on Monday was the play of Kennard and Chris Robinson. When Coach Cal can depend on Robinson Squared to spell his starters, the theme of team ball comes to the fore.

With Derek Kellogg visibly tired, Chris played an aggressive ten minutes, showing composure and hauling in three boards. Special K logged 14 minutes, five points and he used all his fouls in intimidating anyone who came near the paint.

"You're talking about two kids who haven't played much, but when they're asked to step in, they get it done," said Cal. "Chris works harder than almost anyone in practice."

• Trying to stop Lou Roe on Monday was like trying a U-turn on the Ben Franklin Bridge — you just can't do it.

• The three-person entourage from ESPN that shadowed Cal and his pals all weekend had to have gotten some vintage footage. "Cal, Live and Uncensored" would surely be a Top Ten video.

• Bill Cosby made a special appearance at the A-10 Awards banquet on Saturday and was expectedly biased towards his friend John Chaney's squad. His UMass/Temple connection is a great sub-plot for Thursday's game.

The Cos played an impressive cowbell with the St. Bonaventure Pep Band for their rendition of the National Anthem. On his way across the floor he gave the Bonnie's Jeff Quackenbush and then UMass' Tony Barbee a friendly shove. The Quack, The Cos and Tony. It could replace "Cheers."

• Cravat Craziness is coinciding nicely with March Madness and the ties dangling from various necks in the Palestra were almost as impressive as the Old Building itself.

When Hampshire Gazette sports editor Jim Degnim showed up with stirrups on his sweet silk, we had to establish a new category for Guys With Rhyming Names Who Wear Western Ties in Eastern Cities. Degnim holds the early lead. He also gets the nod for calling Gazette legend, Milt Cole "The Jimi Hendrix of Writers." Milt preferred the Bing Crosby analogy.

• About 20 minutes after Steve Worthy's desperation shot clanged off the rim against St. Joseph's, he sat with his head in his hands at the postgame, press conference table. Then, like a true gentleman he placed the blame for Rutgers' loss squarely on the referees shoulders.

"He [Bernrad Blunt] did every [expletive] thing we told the refs he would do," said Worthy. "We said he'd hit you on the arm when you shoot and he did. We told the refs he'd poke you in the eye, and he did."

Worthy was confident of his ability to make it in the NBA but noted it doesn't "matter what I believe." Offensively he's got the skills and if attitude is a prerequisite for the Pros, Steve Worthy is a lottery pick.

• We're still checking, but sources have suggested that John Chaney is actually the mayor of Philadelphia.

• The Rick Brunson that came to the Cage for the Jan. 21 game that Temple lost will not be the same Brunson that is in Mullins on Thursday. The March version of the Salem, Mass. native is now a confident point guard who has taken the reigns of a team that is playing inspired ball. Add to that, an added measure of confidence from his teammates and Brunson is no longer a sophomore. He is a leader.

"He's playing great ball, he's running the ball club and his creating for us," said teammate and A-10 Player of the Year, Aaron McKie. "He's also making his free-throws."

• We'll see who the real Player of the Year is on Thursday and don't think Lou and Harper won't have it in their heads.

• Yinka Dare and William Cunnningham are not small men.

• An aspiring Olympian in Philly auditioned his broom toss for this writer on a sidewalk. Good distance, no velocity.

• Let's put Thursday's game back in the Cage.

• We're still tabulating votes for the naming of my niece or nephew. Results next week.

• Keep your feet in bounds and your eyes on the West Virginia student radio duet.

UMass lax ready for redemption

All-American Millon leads Gorillas on quest to NCAAs

By GREG SUKIENNIK
Collegian Staff

Last spring, the University of Massachusetts men's lacrosse team found themselves in an unfamiliar position — left out of the NCAA Division I tournament.

Next Saturday, the Gorillas, ranked 12th in the nation in the United States Intercollegiate Lacrosse Association's pre-season poll, will begin the road back to the NCAAs in Charlottesville, Va. against the University of Virginia.

Last season, despite a 9-3 record against a strong schedule and a season-long stay in the United States Intercollegiate Lacrosse Association's Top 20 poll, the Gorillas were passed over. Coach Ted Garber thinks the team can return to the tournament, but admits it won't be easy.

"Division I lacrosse is the toughest challenge to receive an NCAA tornament bid," Garber said. "You only get 14 games to make it or break it. You have to be ready for every game."

The Cavaliers, currently ranked No. 5 and 2-0 courtesy of wins over Villanova (21-6) and 11th-ranked Navy (9-7), will have the advantage of having played four regular season games to UMass' none when the two teams take the field at Scott Stadium in Charlottesville.

"They'll be playing their fifth game and we've been in Boyden for six weeks," Garber said. "But I think we can be competitive and hold our own."

Here is a look at the Gorillas, piece by piece:

Attack: First team All-American Mark Millon will doubtless be the focal point for opposing defenses. Millon, a senior co-captain, will once again be asked to both "quarterback" the offense from behind the crease and be the team's go-to scorer. Garber said Millon is "the top attacker in the country." He has not been held scoreless in a game since the 1990 NCAA quarterfinal.

To complement Millon's scoring and keep teams from keying on him exclusively, Garber is counting on contributions from attackers Wes Depp, John Cavalerio and Mike Valente.

"I'm expecting a lot from Wes Depp," said Garber. "He has a knack for finding openings in front of the crease."

Midfield: Graduation losses figure big here, where departed middies John Shlipf and Mike Cain combined for 40 goals last season. But returnees Billy Edell and Greg Kline should be able to step up and produce, as should Joe Loiacono, who was injured in fall but should be back.

New faces abound in the midfield as well. Recruits Eric Triolo (Huntington Station, N.Y.), Eric Bailey (Cheshire, Conn.), Buddy Hoffman (Long Beach, N.Y.) and Hobart transfer Kenny Ward will be asked to make an immediate impact.

COURTESY SPORTS INFORMATION

Senior Mark Millon, an All-American last year, hopes to lead the UMass Gorillas back to the NCAA Lacrosse Tournament this season. The Gorillas play Virginia in Charlottesville next Saturday.

At defensive midfield, solid two-way player Chris Nentwich returns. He wil be joined by Nassau County Community College transfer Jimmy Byrnes.

Defense: The Gorillas lost a solid player and team leader when All-American Rick Mullins re-injured his already banged-up knee in fall. Additionally, Brad Fitts and Corey Cronin were lost to graduation. But key returnees and transfers should keep the defense solid.

Potential starters include Kenny Randazzo, co-captain Jim Panetta and Adam Kohart. Transfers Jerry Murphy (Herkimer C.C.) and Mike McGovern (Brown) will also see playing time.

"[McGovern] has the potential to be an outstanding player," Garber said.

Goal: Here the Gorillas have an embarrassment of riches. Rip Correnti, who started in goal last year until suffering a collapsed lung, and Tom LoPresti, who played well as a freshman, are both vying for the starting job.

Roe finds a new, yet old energy

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

Monday night, Lou Roe had butterflies racing around his stomach.

The University of Massachusetts forward was so nervous about playing Rhode Island in the Atlantic 10 Tournament, he spent Monday afternoon unable to even wear his trademark smile.

"That's when I knew I was going to have a big night," Roe said. "Every time I get the butterflies in my stomach I have a big game."

It was URI coach Al Skinner who should have been nervous, as the sophomore from Atlantic City, N.J., poured in 24 points, grabbed nine rebounds and swatted two Ram shots. Even more impressive was Roe's defensive play on Ram reserve forward Kyle Ivey-Jones.

In Rhode Island's 71-68 regular season victory over Massachusetts, Ivey-Jones had his way with Roe, as the junior scored 20 points in 21 minutes on a foul-plagued Roe.

"I got into foul trouble and he took advantage of me," said Roe, who was named First Team All A-10 this season. "Then he talked it up. I wanted to pay him back and show him how a first team player plays.

"Before the game I went over to his bench and said 'When you get into the game there is no way you are going to score. Don't even bring the ball inside.'"

Ivey-Jones converted only two field goals and collected one rebound in the Minutemen's 76-50 victory.

Roe, who was named a District 1 (Northeast) First Team All-Star, by the United States Basketball Writers, was also motivated by the lack of respect the Rams were giving him after being named All A-10.

"During the shoot-around they were saying 'Lou who?' and 'Who are you?'" Roe said. "I wanted them to feel how a All-Conference player plays."

UMass coach John Calipari said, "When Lou Roe wants it, he's the best player in our conference. I just wish he wanted it every minute of every game."

Roe admits that on butterfly nights, he is difficult to stop.

"Sometimes when I'm rebounding my eyeballs are right up next the rim," Roe said. "I just outleap everyone. I get jacked up and I don't fell like I can be stopped."

Roe is uncertain why he is not nervous each game but Calipari wishes he could bottle the feeling.

"If you know how, let me know," Calipari said. "It's tough to get Lou to play 40 minutes, but when he does, we usually win."

Roe said, "I have to think about what I did the night before. Did I sleep? Did I take a shower? I have to do the same for every game."

Motivation is more likely the reason for the 6-foot-7 Roe's big games, Calipari said, which is why the fifth-

Women's gym shows promise

The University of Massachusetts women's gymnastics team combined youth with experience last Saturday and came up with its best performance of the year in front of a deafening crowd of 6,013 at the Bulldog Invitational in Athens, Ga.

UMass was led by freshmen Shaheda Keels and Leann Zavotka, who had the best performance of their young careers. To top off the day, the Minutewomen received a sparkling routine by senior Abby May on the balance beam en route to a team score of 186.55.

Despite finishing fourth, head coach Alfie Mitchell said he was extremely pleased with both the score and how his team has pulled together recently.

"We had a really consistent and strong effort all the way through," said Mitchell. "Realistically speaking, we looked good and we weren't 100 percent. We did not have any letdowns. Everyone who went up [on the mat] did what they had to do, and they looked good."

Keels, the only all-arounder for the Minutewomen in the meet, scored her career-high (37.65) in place of senior Tammy Marshall and junior Margaret Furtado, who could not compete in all four events. Keels scored a 9.45

Peking Garden offers stellar variety & service

By GREG SUKIENNIK

The way some students talk about Hadley, it might as well be in New York State. "Oh, it's in Hadley?" they whine.

Well, listen up. It's well worth the drive or the bus ride to visit one of the valley's best Chinese restaurants, the Peking Garden. If you don't trust me, ask my 11-year-old brother who, after dining there during a visit to the Valley, gave it his highest rating — and eleven-year-olds do not impress easily.

REVIEW

The Peking Garden's atmosphere balances the usual restaurant furnishings (booths and brass railings) with authentic Chinese decor. Despite the fact it was a Saturday night and therefore busy, the atmosphere remained relaxed and comfortable.

The menu presents a number of styles as well as some nice-looking specials. The price range is consistent with other Chinese restaurants, with entrees beginning around $6 and topping out at $19.50.

Reviewing a Chinese restaurant is difficult because of the wide variety of items on the menu — over 150 at the Peking Garden, for example. So to gauge the Peking Garden's performance, my friend Amy and I went for the "basics." Cooking is like any other skill — if you can't nail the basics, you probably won't be able to do the fancy stuff.

Happily, the Peking Garden does the basics really well. Starting with the appetizers, a sprig of broccoli and a slice of sweet and sour pork added a creative touch to the wanton soup, which was on the salty side but delicious. The chicken wings were both large and tasty.

Moving along to the entrees: I chose the shrimp lo mein while Amy had the diced chicken with cashews. Neither disappointed.

Lo mein is a delicate pasta dish and tends to be overcooked on occasion. Peking Garden's lo mein was delicate and delicious. Neither the noodles nor the shrimp, another common over-cooking victim, were overdone. Bamboo shoots added a nice touch as well.

The chicken was served with water chestnuts and snow peas and was delicious. Some Chinese restaurants overload your taste buds with enough MSG to stone you, but the food at Peking Garden was lightly seasoned and delicate.

Final verdict? The service was excellent, the food was delicious and there's plenty of parking in back. Never mind the distance from UMass — jump in the Dodge Dart or the PVTA and try the Peking Garden for yourself.

Superior lives up to their name

Fast delivery and plenty of 'burnt cheese bubbles'

By JON LUPO

In a town like Amherst, where college students' hungry stomachs and full wallets seem to rule the day, pizza places are bound to proliferate. This is great for everyone, because you're bound to have your favorite. When it comes to pizza, did you ever notice that suddenly everybody becomes a food critic? Pizza is the type of food that people are known to have knock-down, dragged-out fights over which is the best.

REVIEW

I have my favorite too. So I approached the "new" Superior Pizza with some trepidation. Especially with a name like Superior — a little haughty aren't we? — I decided nonetheless to give Superior Pizza my "I'm not in the mood for scrod again so now I'm hungry" test.

Dorm delivery seemed like a good idea since I wasn't about to go out in the cold snow for anyone, no matter how good their pizza. I looked over their appetizing menu of a wide array of pizza, steak grinders and toasted or cold grinders, ad well as a small but impressive list of authentically Italian dinner entrees. After much indecision, I went with something simple: one large plain pizza. My motto is that if you can't do a plain pizza right, don't bother putting on any toppings.

One of the first things I liked about Superior Pizza was that the person who took my order over the phone didn't have that wiseacre "Whaddayawant?" attitude. I had to decide which coupon I'd use from their ad in the Collegian. $1.50 off or four free Cokes with any large pizza. I decided to save the Collegian some cash and took the $1.50 off.

Just under a half an hour later, a phone call beckoned me to my dorm lobby with that familiar phrase: "in about four to five minutes." And in, well, four to five minutes, the hot pizza with the great aroma was in my eager hands.

I invited my floormates to sample the pizza, even though I really wanted to hog it for myself. But, heck, I'm a generous guy when I'm not paying for the food. The pizza looked delicious and the aroma after I opened the pizza box brought me back to my trip the rain drenched streets of Venice, Italy and I had an incredible urge for an International Coffee. Who was that delivery guy? Jean-Luc?! Okay, so I'm exaggerating, but it was good.

One friend commented on the abundance of "burnt cheese bubbles" and quickly gulped down his slice. Another friend really liked the "crisp, chewy crust" and the "tasty cheese."

While the crust and cheese was a big hit with me and my friends, the sauce didn't fare so well. The comments ranged from "bland" to "unimpressive." I liked it better than they did, and appreciated the fact that, unlike other pizza sauces, it didn't bombard you with spices. I thought it struck a nice balance.

Overall, my friends and I rated Superior Pizza six "thumbs up" and said it was a good pizza to eat when you were with your friends watching TV or just hanging out.

The next test happened the following morning, where I had saved a piece to check out the pizza's ability to act as a tasty breakfast food. And just like fine wine and Cheers, Superior Pizza just gets better with age (or refrigeration?) So, if your looking for a different kind of pizza, try Superior's Pizza. In fact, buy two, so you'll have a treat the following morning.

Relive the tastes of summer – without the guilt

By DARIENNE HOSLEY
Collegian Staff

With snow sputtering from the sky and white fluffy stuff still covering the ground, you may be more tempted to grab a cup of hot java than a bite of something cold and frosty.

But spring is just beginning to creep back into the valley, and soon will bring the season of long afternoons, sunny days — and ice cream. Feeling pangs of dietary guilt already? Go for the frozen yogurt.

I tramped through a slushy mess Saturday afternoon to Bananarama, in downtown Amherst, and got a preview of just how good spring can be.

Sundaes
REVIEW

Bananarama serves up nonfat frozen yogurt in its own little oasis. Two painted palm trees reach to the ceiling, with clusters of bananas and a grinning monkey hanging down from the leaves. A giant gorilla sporting shades and a Hawaiian shirt swings over the counter, and prints of flamingos, palm trees and dancing bananas hang on soft pink and blue walls.

The menu offers five flavors of nonfat, soft-serve frozen yogurt vanilla, chocolate, banana, white chocolate almond and sugar-free raspberry — in addition to twists of different flavors. All nonfat. Leave guilt at the door.

Specialties include frozen chocolate-dipped bananas, Belgian waffle sundaes, frozen yogurt pies, waffle cones and cups, fruit parfait, milk shakes, fruit coolers and the Bananarama Boat. And everything is under $3.

Dry toppings are fairly standard: M&Ms, chocolate/peanut butter/butterscotch chips, sprinkles (or jimmies, if you prefer), trail mix, granola, Rice Krispies, etc. Bonus: the coconut is moist, not dry and stale and crunchy. Bananarama's hot fudge comes in both regular and nonfat form, and strawberries, blueberries, raspberries and hot spiced apples can aiso top your sundae.

I had a waffle cup sundae with banana frozen yogurt, raspberries and trail mix, for $2.65. The yogurt was very, very good — smooth, and the flavor was just right. Not sugary, not too artificial, just sweet banana in frosty form. And raspberries in early March were a treat.

A friend had chocolate frozen yogurt with coconut, and said it tasted like "authentic chocolate, not fake like chocolate flavor."

Bananarama is not the place to go if you want to wallow in a sinfully sweet, rich chocolatey-fudgey sugar rush. These sundaes are for fruit lovers looking for something light and delicious.

Greatest disappointment: only five flavors. That's fine for those with simple tastes, but very frustrating for those who believe half the fun of a sundae is choosing from a long, tantalizing list of flavors.

'Giant' calzones make Krete well worth the wait

By GREG AYMIE
Collegian Correspondent

With so many take-out restaurants to choose from, UMass students may be a little confused about where to go. The bottom line in any restaurant business comes down to one thing: good food and a lot of it. Krete Restaurant delivers the goods.

Krete has the typical take-out foods found all over, subs and pizzas as well as their own specialty, the "giant" calzone that is well worth the extra couple o'bucks.

Ranging anywhere in price from $4.50 to $8, these zones are more than twice the size of the typical calzone around town. Size isn't the only difference in their calzones, they offer a distinct taste for the diner to enjoy.

One word of advice, however, their menu is basically up to you so be prepared to explain what you want. There are no catchy names for the zones, only a list of ingredients to choose from and some old fashioned know-how.

They offer the typical choices: steak, hamburg, pepperoni, the usual veggies, and if you like they will throw some spicy ricotta to create a unique flavor that rivals the other zone makers around town.

Krete deals in bulk with pizza as well. They have a "Party Size" pizza that has 32 slices for about 12 clams. Eating at Krete is an entirely different experience. Besides the pizzas, subs and zones; they also have gyros, chicken and steak ka-bobs, and other Greek delicacies, again in huge portions. They even throw in soup, salad, and some garlic bread to boot.

Take-out, as most students realize, is the basic sustenance for students living off-campus as well as in the dorms, and is great for a quick hunger fix. However, students that live in and around the campus area, beware, Krete is notorious for their slow delivery.

REVIEW

Don't take this the wrong way, the food is always hot and fresh, but it seems to take a little longer to bring out their unique flavor. It took exactly 53 minutes from "Hello, Krete..." to the "keep the change" finale, but it was well worth the wait for the mouth-watering portion of steak, ricotta and veggies.

With a plan-ahead attitude, some practice, and a lot of luck, students should be able to make the delivery and their hunger pangs coincide.

One last word of advice, it would be handy to have a Greek translator near-by, or some patience over the phone because it may take some time to reach an agreement on what exactly it is you are ordering. Heavy accents combined with the lack of catchy zone names may slow down the process, but the bottom line is the food, which is great.

Overall, Krete gives a lot of good food for a price that will enable students to stay out of the poor house, for a little while at least.

'Elegant feel' makes Fitzwilly's a charmer

By JEFF CROFTS
Collegian Staff

Aah... I have to admit it, the only reason why I wanted to review Fitzwilly's was so that I could watch the UMass-St. Bonaventure game on Sportschannel at the TV at the bar. Despite the fact that I found out that Fitzwilly's does not have Sportschannel, I was pleased with the restaurant as a whole.

The restaurant had an elegant yet familiar feel to it, which made it very comfortable to eat at. The service at the resaurant, which includes a wise-cracking hostess, was very pleasant and delivered the goods in prompt fashion.

I started out with a potato skin appetizer. The skins were great, only one problem, the portion of the appetizer was better fit for that of a TV dinner than that of a fine establishment like Fitzwilly's.

After the skins, I decided to go with lasagna pizza over a multitude of other worthy candidates. The pizza, thin with ricotta and mozzerella cheese galore, had nice chunks of hamburg and sausage sprinkled throughout it. The sourdough crust was baked crisp, much to my hearts' delight.

My dining compadres for the night, Art and Sean, both enjoyed a chicken parmesean sandwiches. Art obviously enjoyed his, seeing that he devoured it in approximately three seconds. Their skin-on french fries were very good, as I'll be the first to admit to having a french fry fetish.

The drinks were basic: Coke (oops, I mean Pepsi) and Beer. At $1.35 a pop, I want more than Pepsi, I want gold-tinted Pepsi. No free refills? C'mon don't drive me to Taco Bell!

All in all, Fitzwilly's was an enjoyable experience. Even though I did not see the hoops game (from which I hear I did not miss much), I did get to enjoy fine mid-priced cuisine at a comfortable place.

Papa Gino's: the perfect movie-date pizza joint

ARAM COMJEAN / COLLEGIAN

There's life at the end of the Dead Mall in Papa Gino's.

By JON LUPO
Collegian Staff

This review is about two things I think I know a lot about: movies and pizza. This isn't about movies about pizza or anything, but rather about the marriage of these two uniquely American icons and where you can sample both just a stone's throw away from each other.

If you think about it, movies and pizza go together like Mom and apple fruit roll-ups. Both have achieved a kind of mythical ideal here in the good ol' U.S.A. and people have wildly different ideas about what's good and what's bad.

Yes, I'm coming to a point. I went to the Mountain Farms AMC Four Theaters with a pal o' mine to catch a flick and then try out Papa Gino's. My opinions of the movie can be seen elsewhere, so I'll just stick to the great meal at the cool price.

If you think about it, both the movie theater and Papa Gino's have been given raw deals. How where they supposed to know they would end up being the big anchor in a place now referred to as the "Dead Mall?"

But still, the theater and Papa Gino's stays on, providing good movies (most of the time) and great pizza (all of the time).

Like all fast food restaurants, every Papa Gino's looks about the same as every other Papa Gino's. The same red and white checkered tables, the same jukebox, the same pizza. This can be very reassuring because, if you like Papa Gino's pizza — and I do — then you know you'll like it anywhere.

But then again, there's something different, almost unique about this Papa Gino's. Nestled next to the movie theater, there's a certain "movie" feel to the whole place. After each screening, it's fun to go in there and listen to people talk about the movie they've just seen.

Low prices, tasty buffets highlight Hunan Garden

By MICHAEL WEBBER
Collegian Staff

If you want to stuff yourself with Chinese food but don't have a lot of money, the Hunan Garden on Route 9 is the place for you. Their all-you-can-eat lunch and dinner buffets for $6.50 are reasonably-priced ways to satisfy cravings that would rack up a serious bill at other Valley restaurants.

REVIEW

Every night but Friday the Hunan Garden offers a dinner buffet from 5 to 8 p.m. with a variety of pork, chicken, beef, seafood, vegetable and other dishes. Their Sunday lunch buffet from 11:30 a.m. to 3 p.m. costs the same and offers similar fare.

The regular dinner menu is also worth considering, since its average entree price of about $6.50 makes it one of the more inexpensive of the Valley's many Chinese restaurants.

At the Hunan Garden low prices don't translate into poor service, though. Food comes quickly and with a smile, tea pots and water glasses are refilled promptly and every meal ends with the traditional fortune cookies.

The menu includes the traditional appetizers, including egg rolls, Chinese ravioli and pan-fried wontons, as well as more exotic items such as szechuan pickled cabbages. The piquant hot and sour soup is one of the best bets on the soup list, although the broth is a bit on the watery side. The wonton soup has plenty of fresh vegetables, but tastes a bit like Ramen Pride.

The House Special Beef, one of the more expensive menu items, is a tasty option. The long, gnarly strips of beef aren't much to look at, but are tender and served in a sweet, flavorful sauce. The dish includes broccoli, apparently intended to please those who like more stem than crown.

The Shanghai duck with Chinese vegetables is bony and bland, and probably best avoided.

Lemon Gai Poo, a chicken dish, is an unusual option. Large, boneless chunks of chicken are topped with a sweet sauce that tastes remarkably like lemon meringue pie.

The Szechuan spiced lamb, although designated as hot and spicy on the menu, is rather mild, with the exception of the hot red peppers which accompany the vegetables and peanuts in the sauce. This can be confusing to the palate, since individual bites can be anywhere between bland and blazing hot.

The menu has the usual pork, chicken, beef and seafood fried rice offerings, as well as the Hunan fried rice, which has a little bit of everything, including some distracting chunks of nearly raw onion. The rice itself was on the dry side.

The interior of Hunan Garden is very pink, and with vinyl-upholstered seats and clear plastic table covers does not shy away from the use of 70s-style polymers. Peculiar wood carvings separate the booths from each other, but the dining room has a relaxed, open atmosphere.

Rafters: more than just your average sports bar

By JASON GEORGE
Collegian Staff

If you are looking for a place with cold drinks and hot food, as well as somewhere to watch enough sports to satiate even the biggest junky, then Rafters is the place for you.

Rafters, located on 422 Amity Street just a hop, skip and jump from Southwest and the Mullins Arena, offers a wide-ranging menu, full bar, as well as eight regular-sized and one large screen television.

Before one even looks at the menu, it is hard not to notice the high ceilings, which create a feeling of spaciousness, as well as numerous colorful banners and signs.

The menu is medium-priced, with appetizers ranging from buffalo wings to four different kinds of nachos. The appetizers also include such standard fare as mozzarella sticks, french fries and onion rings.

I started my meal off with an order of six buffalo wings ($2.75) and shared a cold pitcher of Miller Genuine Draft ($5.25) with my companion for the evening. The glasses were frosted, which is always a bonus, and the wings were prepared to just the right level of spiciness.

As a main course, I ordered a blackened cajun chicken sandwich ($5.95), which came with fries and garnish. The sandwich was right on the money — the chicken was well-flavored, the bread was fresh and the fries were crispy and fresh as well.

Choosing my meal was difficult, as the menu offered everything from 10 different kinds of salad, ranging from fried chicken to tostada salad, to 15 different types of individual gourmet pizzas, ranging from Five Cheese and Pesto to Red Bliss Potato.

Among the entrees, you can choose between 17 types of sandwiches, priced between $5 and $6, and 7 types of burgers, priced between $4 and $5.

If dinner is not enough, Rafters offers mocha mud pies, cheesecake and brownie sundaes as dessert samplings. There is also a kid's menu for the little ones, with grilled cheese, hamburgers and chicken fingers.

As I munched my meal, I was able to take in the California-Arizona college basketball game. There is a clear view of a television from aimost any spot in Rafters.

The service was quick, efficient and courteous, although the restaurant was not particularly crowded at the time we ate.

I closed out the evening with a Tequila Sunrise for dessert, which was delicious and capped off an extremely satisfying dining experience.

Well-rounded eats at the new, improved Pub

By JON LUPO
Collegian Staff

Tucked away like a treasure chest behind the flashier Bertucci's and other Triangle square activity is arguably Amherst's most-well rounded restaurant. Others may specialize in various cuisines, but none can match the most versatile and the best tasting restaurant within walking distance of the University.

That place is, of course, The Pub, a family-couple-group restaurant that can cater to almost any taste. From stir-fry to Mexican eats, The Pub offers an outstanding ten-page menu, a relaxed, open atmosphere and fantastic service.

It's unique because you can go there a dozen or so times and never have the same thing twice. It's a measure of a great restaurant when it takes twice the usual time to pick an appetizer, entree or dessert.

The Pub is celebrating its 25th anniversary this year and it's easy to see why. They are also in the process of renovating and the time that I went it looked just about done. They've added more windows to let the pools of light pour in, but still retain just the right about of wood panelling and brass railings to keep the dining area from appearing sterile.

Even though I'm not 21, my dining companion was and she commented that the bar was big and looked inviting. She declined, though, because we were there on serious food business.

I was in a fried-food mood so I ordered deep fried chicken strips and and a side order of The Pub's scrumptiously seasoned waffle fries. These fries are to kill for.

I'm a big fan of Papa Gino's thin but hearty crust, zesty, rich sauce and their full-bodied cheese that sneaks up on you while you're eating. But Papa Gino's is a lot more than just pizza. Just a quick glance at their large menu will convince you of that.

Along with a variety of pizza toppings, Papa Gino's offers a bevy of delectable Italian dishes and hot and cold subs. Their pizza may have made them famous, but it is far from their only asset.

Papa Gino's may be a big chain, but you never get the feeling they've gone big business. It's the friendly, comfortable atmosphere and the helpful, fast service that keeps you coming back for more. And I also like the system of waiting in hungry anticipation for the counter help to call your number. When they do, it's like winning some sort of food lottery.

Papa Gino's is comparable to other pizza chains, both big and small. I got a large pizza and two large cokes for just under ten bucks. And if you have a student I.D., you can get ten percent off your meal. This makes dinner and a movie a worthy date without breaking anyone's bank.

Lisa ordered a Boursin Burger and had only compliments about the portions, appearance, taste and texture. From the lettuce ("crisp, not wilty"), the tomatoes ("cold and fresh") to the "crispy outside, soft inside" homemade roll, she said that "every bite was a tasty, delicious experience."

My chicken was golden and crisp, and coupled with the flavorful mustard sauce provided, I was in heaven.

The service was prompt and courteous and a quick glance around showed that everyone in the restaurant was enjoying The Pub's great food and feel.

If you haven't been, allow me to mangle Horace Greely: "Go East (Pleasant Street, that is), young men (and women).

The best reason to go to Hunan Garden is the all-you-can-eat buffets, although you can get decent food at a decent price any other time, too. It's not the best Chinese food in the Valley, but the good service and low prices make this restaurant worth considering.

Rally pushes 'legalization'

Speakers hope hemp vote influences Housing policy

By KENDRA WILLETT
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts students were urged to vote to support the Cannabis Reform Coalition's proposal to "legalize" marijuana on campus during a rally on the Student Union Steps yesterday.

Yesterday was the second and final day in which UMass students could vote in a campus-wide referendum to support the Coalition's initiative. Results were unvailable at press time.

Passage of the referendum will accomplish two things, according to Coalition Vice-President Aaron Wilson.

Passage will both send a strong political message and demonstrate support for the Coalition's proposal that University Housing policies be changed so that an individual caught with the drug receives the same punishment as an underage drinker.

Mark Button, a reporter for the Advocate and member of Families Against Mandatory Minimums, argued that people caught with drugs receive more punishment than people charged with maiming others.

"We cannot afford to keep incarcerating addicts," Button said. "Nobody comes out of jail cured of addiction."

Steven Levine, a member of The Libertarian Party, began his speech with reference to the recent incident of Boston Celtic Robert Parish getting caught with the drug.

"Now there's an example of a pot smoker leading an unproductive life!" Levine said sarcastically.

"This 'War on Drugs' makes it sound like Americans have a common enemy," Levine said, "when the truth is, more than half of America has experimented with drugs at one point or another."

According to Levine, even the word "drugs" itself is misleading, because aspirin and penicillin also fall into that category, and he said America doesn't have a problem with those.

A speaker addresses yesterday's "get out the vote" rally sponsored by the Cannabis Reform Coalition to support their campus-wide referendum question seeking to "legalize" marijuana on campus.

Onlooker Seth Cohen, a member of The Cannabis Reform Coalition, said he believed drug laws were directed at certain races like Blacks and Hispanics.

"There is also a lot of misinformation being spread around by the government," Cohen said.

Northampton lawyer Richard Evans addressed the crowd as a generation of Americans who can make a difference.

Cairo fighting ends in death of Muslims

By MAURICE GUINDI
Associated Press

CAIRO, Egypt — In on one the bloodiest such incidents in a decade, seven Muslim extremists were killed and at least 15 wounded in a gunfight with police at a mosque in Aswan, authorities said today.

Saeed Hilmy, chief prosecutor on the southern resort, said by telephone that two plainclothes policemen also were wounded in Tuesday night's gunbattle, one critically after a bullet grazed his heart.

Extremists seeking to overthrow Egypt's largely secular government and replace it with a strict Islamic state have in the past few months been attacking foreign tourists in popular resorts like Aswan.

They want to scare away visitors and deprive the government of money from tourism, its top foreign exchange earner.

The shootout occurred a few hours after a military court near Cairo began hearing the case against 49 Muslim extremists charged with terrorism, including attacks on tourists.

Some of the defendants opened the trial by professing allegiance to an extremist cleric who preaches at the New Jersey mosque where a Palestinian suspected in the World Trade Center bombing worships.

Aswan, 615 miles south of Cairo, is southern

Assaults investigated

Unit looks at possible racial overtones

By CHRISTINA ROTHWELL
Collegian Staff

A series of assaults which occurred last Friday night, are being investigated by the Community Disorders Unit of the University of Massachusetts Police Department, police reports said.

Three separate events were reported to UMass police late Friday night that spanned from Central to Southwest. The victims alleged that their assailants were Black, but UMass officials say they do not believe, based on current information, the incidents were racially motivated.

After studying in the School of Management Building and then grabbing an ice cream between 11:30 p.m. and midnight, sophomore Jason Nietupski alleged he was assaulted by four men near Cance.

"I was minding my own business, when they suddenly attacked me," Nietupski said.

As he walked by the group, Nietupski said a man with a hood lined with grey fur hit him in the mouth.

Although he offered his wallet, Nietupski said the alleged assailants did not take it and then hit him three to four times in the back of his head.

Nietupski said the assaults left him with a concussion, swollen lips and loose teeth. He said he declined medical attention that night and went to University Health Services the next day.

"I think it was racial. If this happened the other way around, there would be a riot," Nietupski said. "I don't want to start a riot or anything."

Police have yet to officially connect Nietupski's incident with two others that

Mullins seeks to bring UM sports to next level

By TRACY MONAHAN
Collegian Staff

The William D. Mullins Center, the University of Massachusetts' new $52 million dollar multifunctional arena, was built partly with the hopes of helping UMass reach the level of other major college athletic programs.

Other universities across the country which have large arenas that house their sporting events appear in many ways similar to the University.

Syracuse University, for example, houses the Carrier Dome, a 33,000-seat domed arena that holds basketball games, concerts and other school events.

At Syracuse, students have unlimited seating for events at eight dollars a ticket. Syracuse has a lottery system for the distribution of tickets, which is based on each student's academic year and the number of games they attended.

The dome is run by the school and students have no control over what events are held there. They pay a $97.50 student activities fee that is allocated to different student organizations and is used in part to run the dome, according to Louis Marcoccia, senior vice-president of business and finance at Syracuse University.

Parking was a problem for Syracuse when it was first built. Professors also feared that the new focus on sporting events would take away from the academic aspects of the school, according to The Daily Orange, the student newspaper of Syracuse University.

West Virginia University is a public school that has the Coliseum, a 14,000-seat arena. The Coliseum was built in 1970 at a cost of $10.4 million dollars.

Students are allowed 3,200 of the seats and receive them free with a valid student identification and a recreation card, which is similar to UMass' activity card. All tickets for the month go on sale the first day of the month.

Students at West Virginia pay a $40 athletic fee that helps to run the Coliseum. The sports program sees very little money from the university, but also doesn't give any back, according to Craig Walker, director for administration and finance.

The Thomas and Mack Center at UNLV has 18,500 seats, 4,000 of which are reserved for students. The tickets are distributed in the student government office

Mullins head seeks safety and security

By FRANCIS ZERA
Collegian Staff

When attending a concert or event at the new Mullins Center, the first Center staff one usually encounters are security. Once inside the arena, security staff are generally forgotten about while everybody enjoys the show.

That is, unless you decide to create your own little show. Then you'll meet them again.

Lee Eskilson, the executive director of the Mullins Center, works for Ogden Entertainment Services, which received the contract to manage the facility for the University. Eskilson said "the word 'normal' doesn't pertain too often" to the business of entertainment security.

He said the size and type of the security force varies depending upon the size of the crowd and the type of performance being given. For example, Esckilson said that a sold-out Bill Cosby show would require less police coverage than the upcoming Guns 'n Roses show.

UMass Police Log

Compiled by Brian Gormley

Recent incidents recorded by the University's Department of Public Safety.

Vandalism

• Tuesday morning two vending machines were damaged in Herter Hall. The damage was caused by someone pouring a solution into the coin slots. This short-circuits the machine. Damage was estimated at $5,600.

Accident-Property Damage

• Monday night an individual reported his vehicle on Commonwealth Ave. was struck by an unknown vehicle while parked at the Mullins Lot. Estimated damage was $1000.

• Tuesday night an operator backing from a space in Lot 22 slid on ice into another parked vehicle. The total damage was estimated at $200.

Assault & Battery

• Police were called two separate times for a disturbance at the Hatch Bar Tuesday night. On the second call the complainant had left. The victim came to the police station and reported that he had allegedly been assaulted by a male subject and had a gold chain ripped from his neck.

Missing Person

• Tuesday night students called to report a male friend in Johnson had not been seen since March 8, 1993.

College men shed gender roles

By JON MARCUS
Associated Press

WALTHAM — While many of their peers spend spring break ogling women on tropical beaches, some Brandeis University men will be sporting plain white ribbons in a quiet symbol of dissent.

The ribbons represent opposition to sexual harassment and assault, and are part of a new crusade among some men on college campuses.

"It will be a long time before the spring break-type of behavior is gone," said Brian Ammons, a sophomore at North Carolina State University, where he helped to organize a lecture series for men on gender issues. "But there's really a movement that's saying it's not quite as cool as it used to be."

The ribbons first appeared in Canada after 14 women were gunned down at the University of Montreal in 1989 by a man who then took his own life.

Their message has spread south.

"Whether it's men's organizations, men's pro-feminist study groups or white ribbon campaigns, things have really started to pick up," said Steve Patten, a graduate student at York University who coordinates activities on 40 Canadian campuses for the White Ribbon Campaign, based in Toronto.

"Men are taking more of a role in these issues," said Brendan Cohen, a sophomore who is spearheading the campaign at Brandeis.

"It's always been a crisis," said Cohen, who wears a ribbon in the lapel of his sports jacket. "It's just that, recently, society has been more willing to address it in the open."

Students and educators say their colleges are ripe for change.

"On certain campuses there's a real sort of fraternity attitude," said Mike Magee, coordinator of the Canadian white ribbon campaign. "There's a subculture that propagates the idea that there's nothing wrong with this."

Colleges and universities are "probably the most prevalent place where that kind of problem exists right now," said Sean Foxley, a junior at the University of Oregon and director of that school's student organization Man Against Rape. "We've just attained this freedom of being away from our parents and doing what we want, but there's still this lack of maturity. It's on every campus I've seen."

Nearly 1,000 rapes were reported in 1991 to security officials at the nation's universities and colleges, according to figures released under new federal disclosure laws. Officials who deal with sexual assaults said the real number probably is higher.

It was when a woman friend was raped that Jason Schultz, a senior at Duke University, became involved in the student organization Men Acting for Change.

"I was very confused," Schultz said. "I had not been prepared to deal with that. There wasn't a male voice talking about violence."

Ammons said he also acted in response to incidents of rape.

"I just saw on campus that the way rape education had been handled really alienated men," he said. "Every time you hear discussions of rape issues, it's always women as survivors and men as perpetrators. There's never any place for men to have a positive role in dealing with this problem."

The lecture series Ammons helped to organize for men has covered issues such as dating a rape survivor.

"We're not saying there's anything wrong with sexuality, as long as it's a reciprocal situation with equal respect," said Jason McCray, a sophomore at the College of William and Mary.

Some insist this generation of young men is already more aware of sexual harassment issues than its predecessors.

"Male students that I work with have been sensitized in some ways that I wasn't," said Bob Haynor, a 38-year-old residence coordinator at the University of New Hampshire who plans a course for men on gender roles this summer. Members of some UNH fraternities also plan to don white ribbons.

"Some of it is also the fact that a lot of men in my generation have become used to feminism and the idea that violence against women is not something that is okay or natural," Schultz said.

Brotherly Love

PHILADELPHIA — For the second time in as many semesters, "News from other 'U's'" has taken its show on the road and has come up with this observation: One thing college students in Philadelphia have over students at the University of Massachusetts is a better variety when choosing a late night dining spot.

Going home from the bars without a little midnight snack is about as unnatural as making a U-turn on the Ben Franklin Bridge, so this is an important comparison.

Philadelphia offers not only pizza, diners and breakfast places, but also the world-famous Philly Cheese Steak.

If you're willing to take a short cab ride, and trust me, it's not worth driving, you can even experience a Pat's Cheesesteak, arguably Philly's finest.

Five choices of cheese, including cheese whiz, are on the menu and the motion picture Rocky was even filmed there. It is truly the best tasting late night dish this side of Morgantown, W.V..

Real life experience

Who says college is not like the real world? According to The Daily Texan, the student newspaper of the University of Texas, professors who teach in the university's law, business and engineering schools are paid substantially higher salaries than professors who teach fine arts, liberal arts and education.

The Faculty Senate at the Austin, Texas, school reported that law professors make an average of $101,281, (not bad coin, by the way,) as compared to $51,933 for professors of fine arts.

"The primary role is the marketplace," said Elton Sutton, chair of the report committee. "Faculty in law are in high demand in all universities."

The report concluded that the disparities in salaries are common throughout the world of higher education.

"Unfortunately it's not just UT that is unique," Martha Hillary, a music professor, said.

One too many

A recent survey of students at the College of the Holy Cross in Worcester found that young Crusaders drink at a higher level than the national average, according to the student newspaper on campus.

The report found that nearly 77 percent of the junior class should be categorized as binge drinkers, nearly three quarters of the student body has vomited due to alcohol recently (60 percent nationally) and half of the students have suffered memory loss (30 percent nationally).

Student at Holy Cross were not surprised with the findings and blame the lack of "other things to do" as the reason.

"I'd say there's a lot of drinking at Holy Cross because students lack other activities to do and alcohol is very easy to get on campus," a student was quoted as saying.

Holy Cross only allows seniors to park cars on campus, which limits the social options of underclassmen, one administrator argued.

According to the report college students consume a total of 430 gallons of alcohol a year and if all the beer cans emptied by collegians per year were stacked on top of one an other, the cans would reach from the earth to the moon and back with 170 miles left over.

The report was released to a forum entitled, "Is Holy Cross Really a Party School?"

Up in smoke

In keeping with today's theme of professors and substance abuse, a University of Connecticut professor was recently sentenced to a year of probation for drug possession charges, according to The Daily Campus, the student newspaper on campus.

Police charged Professor John D. Craig with possession of marijuana and drug paraphernalia on campus. Craig denies the charges.

With the new UMass Cannabis Reform legislation, I bet Craig wishes he taught in Amherst, where he wouldn't have a problem.

Council sets tuition hike limits

By BRIAN GORMLEY
Collegian Staff

Tuition at the University of Massachusetts will increase between two and four percent next year, Student Government President Jennifer Wood told the Undergraduate Student Senate last night.

Last week, Wood went to Boston to campaign for a zero percent tuition increase with the Massachusetts Higher Education Coordinating Council (HECC). She said the Council defeated the tuition freeze six to five because of an unexpected swing vote.

"The swing vote was by Ron Alman, someone who has for years voted against tuition increases. Alman is president of the International Ladies Garment Worker's Union," Wood said. "I plan to write him a letter asking him where he thinks his union members send their kids to school."

Wood also said she believed Alman's reasoning for supporting the increase was cause for concern. She said he voted in favor of it because he said a two to four percent increase would only cost students an extra $50 to $80.

"It is so hard to fight against a four percent increase because people say that it is not much of an extra cost to students," Wood said. "But Alman did not take into account the fact that the total cost of attending UMass has increased 147 percent in the last five years. It all adds up over time."

The HECC-approved tuition increase will now go before the University's Board of Trustees. The Board will then decide on an increase in the range of two to four percent and submit it back to the HECC for final approval.

Wood said University President Michael Hooker wants students to pay for only 35 percent of their education, with the state paying the rest. Students currently pay 38 percent, Wood said.

She also said, however, that the University will have some incentive to raise tuition the full four percent because of tuition retention, whereby the University maintains a certain percentage of the tuition money it takes in. Tuition retention allows the university to keep the money from the increase and "play around with it," Wood said.

The Undergraduate Student Senate also considered the issues of limiting the number of hours students may work in a week and a four dollar fee that would benefit Registered Student Organizations.

A proposal to limit the number of hours of a student who works on campus to 15 was tabled. The proposal was drawn up in response to students submitting 40-hour pay slips last semester. The proposal also called for all students working on campus to earn no more than minimum wage.

The SGA also tabled a proposed four dollar fee that would raise an estimated $63,000 for Registered Student Organizations. The proposal was made to help offset the $180,000 debt that the Student Activities Office (SAO) now faces. If the debt is not lessened, the SAO will not be able to provide level funds for student organizations in two years, according to student government treasurer Emily Rose.

Activist speaks on fat liberation

Writer says weight has 'own beauty and purpose'

By JOY COLLINS
Collegian Correspondent

"Fat is not a virtue and not a sin — it's a bodily element with its own purpose and beauty," said a fat liberation activist who spoke about her poetry and fiction about fat oppression Tuesday in the Campus Center.

Susan Stinson, a writer and self-described "fat liberated woman" from Northampton, has been published in numerous magazines. She has also run several workshops on fat liberation and has performed at the convention of the National Association for the Advancement of Fat Acceptance.

"Let me define fat oppression," Stinson said. "It is the systematic ridicule, hatred or disgust against fat people based on the belief that we're not as good as thin people."

Stinson said often people believe the misconception that people remain fat because they are lazy, lack the willpower to lose weight or have deep psychological problems.

"Virulent criticism of fat women has to do with sexuality and the fear that we might have sexuality at all," Stinson said.

Stinson said even when people finally recognize an oppressed group, like fat women, they still are not seen as complex human beings.

Stinson's poetry and fiction focuses on the beauty and sensuality of fat lesbians and what it feels like to be a fat woman "whose image is despised in this country," she said.

"The Valley Lesbian Writer's Group is what helps keep me going," Stinson said. "We build a culture for each other, which is essential, since the work of a writer is not rewarded so much."

"Even when I was in my self-hating period, when society was telling me that I was ugly, writing was always a place where I felt strong," Stinson said.

Stinson said she strongly believes in the power of literature.

"It makes us respond emotionally and in an academic setting, that often gets neglected," she said.

"I do other fat liberation workshops, but reading poetry can talk to the heart of it the way nothing else can," Stinson said.

Our mission impossible

The purpose of a simple university is easy to discern. That an institution of higher learning is supposed to educate its students is obvious. It's when the word "public" gets thrown in front that things get more complicated.

While philosophy professors ponder questions like, "Why are we here?" students clutch their thinning wallets and ask, "Why is this university here?" Students know why they are here. They're here because they need an education and can't afford Harvard and Boston University. The University, on the other hand, needs to be reminded why it's here now and then.

Marc
ELLIOTT

Being a state school, the University of Massachusetts at Amherst has its mission statement written into the state general laws. It isn't much of a mission statement. It's kind of short and talks mostly about educating students for four years and giving them degrees afterwards. It was written years ago when just about anyone could handle the cost. But, it's still valid, or legal that is.

New mission statements have been written in over the years, but none have made it through the Board of Trustees, which must approve the statement before it can be made law. The most recent revision was written in 1991 but got bogged down in the Board over wording and technicalities, according to Chancellor Richard O'Brien.

That version was a tad more realistic than the one taken as law. Yes, it still says the University should teach its students for about four years and then give them degrees so they can prove they really did take classes and swill beer at a state school. But the revision had an intriguing addition—a section headed "The Public Trust."

"We acknowledge a special responsibility to those who have the talent to benefit from our faculty and programs but who have been hampered by background or means in their quest for self-development through higher education," it reads. "We are dedicated to helping such students overcome these barriers."

Some would argue that this goal conflicts with recent decisions made by the trustees in the way of tuition and fees. Just this week the Higher Education Coordination Council voted to hike tuition another 2 to 4 percent for next year. They did this, of course, over cries from student representatives that after the series of tuition increases and budget cuts that gutted the state university system over the last five years, this year was the year to hold the line.

Time for a revised mission statement. Time for a mission statement heavy on the "public" to be read before every trustees meeting. A proper mission statement can help administrators and legislators see the whole picture, the people and principles hidden behind the budget reports they deal with usually. Mission statements, however, are difficult to amend because they require so many signatures.

Vision statements are significantly easier. The Board recently approved a new one. Topping the document is a line headed "Access."

"Providing undergraduate education for all qualified students (meeting their full financial need) in a broad range of areas. . ."

What it means to be a 'fag'

You know, a funny thing happened to me on the way to campus the other day. I was walking to the bus stop when a car full of people drove by and one of them screamed out the window, "Hey, fag!"

This took me off guard momentarily, and I thought how strange the comment was. I pondered for a moment on what would have motivated such a taunt from a group in a rapidly moving vehicle. Gee, I had left my tiara, pumps and my entire Clinique cosmetic collection at home, opting for my boots and baseball cap (I was having a bad hair day!).

Shawn
COTTER

So what indeed would prompt such an attack from a rolled-down window on the coldest day of the year, if it wasn't my impeccable fashion sense? Then it occurred to me. It was the same restricting force that guides most of this society and its logic.

If you guessed homophobia, go to the head of the class.

I thought it was amusing that a bunch of idiots in a car smaller than any closet I was ever in had the gall to define me. I can't praise them on their bravery, but at least they chose the right word. I am a fag. I choose to define myself as a fag because the word rolls off the tongue eloquently.

What does the word mean, anyway? Its etymological roots come from "faggot," which mean a bunch of burning sticks. It was applied to men who conspired with witches. They were used as kindling when they burned the witches. Its a caustic word from its very roots, and that's why I like it so much.

"Fag" is a word that makes people's hackles rise, especially if they hear someone identify themselves with the word. It is a very painful word for a lot of gay, lesbian or bisexual folks, as it was for me for a long time.

In my coming out process, I've tried a lot of different labels in my search for one that fits, since society requires people to identify themselves as such. None of the labels given to me, such as heterosexual, homosexual or gay, seemed to fit comfortably with the complex person I am.

Fag for me is the sum of all the parts: male-identified bisexual, male, pro-feminist, activist, Native American, Irish, Spanish, student, filmmaker, uncle, son, lover, queer, human.

It is the only derogatory word that I feel pride in reclaiming and identifying with.

Fag is a word that is hurled at people without thought or consequence, which is why I would like to take its negativity away. It is a word that is part of my history, both personal and cultural: FAG = PRIDE = SHAWN!

A message to the people in their nice, safe car: Sticks and stones may break my bones, but not if I break yours first. Queers bash back! Stop the violence! Peace!

Homosexuals can't understand

Melanie De Silva wrote in her column (Collegian, Feb. 25) that "gay and lesbian cultures do exist like African-American or working class cultures." John Beck stated (Collegian, March 4) that he thinks he "understands some of what Black people must have felt when they had to sit in the back of the buses." Oh really? How can anyone compare their sexuality to someone's race?

I wish you all the luck educating all of us "homophobic" people. However, do not even attempt to make a comparison between Blacks and homosexuals, because I assure you they are very different. Our struggle as African-Americans has lasted thousands of years, and is far from over. So please don't try to freeload for understanding and sympathy. I personally as an African-American feel no connection to you as homosexuals. Why should I? Because you have a different sexual orientation? I could not possibly understand what you go through because I am not a homosexual. Just like you could not possibly understand what I go through unless you are Black or of other non-White descent. To try to latch on to our struggle and say you think you understand what Black people must have felt like is very insensitive.

Mr. Beck, why are you using the past tense? Do you know what it feels like to have someone of your race beaten by police so badly that there couldn't have been a good enough reason? Do you know what it feels like to have no more than 12 percent non-White people including your own race on this campus of 25,000? The fact that you went back all the way to the 1960s proves that you couldn't possibly understand. So don't claim to. It is not fair to me as an African-American.

Notes from the Campus Center Basement

Student Trustee candidate Kevin Jourdain worked desperately during last week's UVC-televised debates, but as political strategies go, his Bible-thumping and reed-hunting routine seems a bit dated. I thought the fun was over when Morrissey dropped out of the race.

If elected, I'm sure he'll make a fine trustee. Judging from the snazzy press release photo he dropped off the other day, he'll be the best-looking conehead in the SGA's reserved seating at home basketball games.

After the first day of voting, the polls reported record-high turnouts, especially impressive for a body that has been limping along without a legitimate constitution for the past two years. Even SGA members were attributing the sudden interest in elections for positions few students seem to understand to the fact that it shared the ballot with the Cannabis Reform Coalition's Hemp Initiative. If it accomplishes nothing else, Question 2 should dispel the truism that stoners are lazy and unmotivated.

Last week I sat through a conversation between two female friends that I'm sure most males have endured at least a few times.

"All guys think with their dicks," one said, pouting about the wrong turn her primary inter-gender relationship had taken the previous day. "O.K., 99 percent of them," she conceded after a nudge of protest from her friend.

At this point the two of them remembered my somewhat uncomfortable presence. "Sorry, Josh."

I told them no harm had been done and excused myself, while imagining their reactions if I had made derogatory remarks about their gender. What if I had made slang reference to female genitalia as a character description?

Josh
REYNOLDS

Unfortunately, in the effort to bring attention to the rape, battering and sexism perpetrated against women, it is easy to vilify the other half of the species. This is not another hysterical tirade against feminism. Gloria Steinem understands the distinction, but UMass's best-known doctor of neutopia, Libby Hubbard, does not.

While it is easy to recommend that Hubbard be removed to another state-run institution, there are plenty of others who, while they may not consciously condemn others for making what they feel is an inappropriate choice of gender, feel comfortable joking about it. For lack of a better term, I'll refer to this phenomenon as "misterogyny."

It's true, there are those who suffer from acute testosterone poisoning, and deserve to be set adrift in the Arctic clinging to empty kegs of Bud Light, but women are no more inherently virtuous.

A childhood friend of my father, who suffered from cerebral palsy, married a large, able-bodied woman, who had promised to care for him as his condition deteriorated. After the nuptials, however, she battered him and managed to spend the savings he had amassed from the teaching job he was now too sick to keep. He eventually escaped, first to a shelter, and after she tracked him down, to relatives in another state.

She's not the only case. Recent evidence suggests that battering is just as frequent amongst lesbian couples as it is among heterosexuals. Similarly, though there are fewer women in positions of political or economic power, vanguards such as Leona Helmsly and Imelda Marcos have shown they are just as corruptible as their male counterparts. Janet Dugan, clerk magistrate of Northampton District court, suspended after the Supreme Judicial Court filed a slew of misconduct charges against her, is a fine local example.

The point of all this is not to protect the male members of the species — most of us can take care of ourselves (last year a house full of involuntarily ineligible bachelors began referring to themselves as "The Everyman's Center."). However, once you feel comfortable making sweeping generalizations about half the human race, you've laid the groundwork for quite a few other less socially acceptable prejudices.

UMass campus is not as safe as you'd like to believe

Wake up, UMass. Your campus is not safe.

Four years ago, during my freshman year, the community was shocked when UMass student Sharon Galligan was brutally murdered in the parking lot of the Hampshire Mall. She had done nothing to provoke such a fate. She had parked close enough to both the mall and a street light that one would think such an attack would be unlikely.

There was nothing she could have done to prevent what Kenneth Mitchell confessed to doing to her in a note he composed before taking his own life this past January. According to Mitchell's account, he saw her and, instead of taking his own life as he had planned, took hers.

Until Mitchell's tragic story came to a sad end in Westfield last January, there was no explanation. No sources came forward. All that were left were sad memories and questions with no answers. Ask a senior about what her memorial service at the Newman Center was like, and he or she will say you would have wept too.

So who's surprised now? An article ran yesterday in the Collegian about a Southwest resident who was jumped from behind and beaten. He had done nothing to provoke being punched in the back of the head. He wasn't expecting danger. There was nothing he could have done differently.

Students cross this campus on foot at night, alone, without any regard for their personal safety. They assume they'll be safe and that random acts of violence are things that happen to other people.

Greg
SUKIENNIK

I hate to wake you, but assumptions like that will get you hurt or killed.

Although the University has complied with a new law which requires colleges to disclose crime statistics to students, it's pretty clear they've covered up a lot. The Division of Public Safety won't tell you where the most rapes occur on campus. They won't tell you how many violent crimes happen on this campus every single weekend.

I will. Drunken fights over stupid stuff occur with alarming frequency. Rapes happen in parking lots. If you walk on campus at night, you might not get attacked, but that doesn't mean someone isn't stalking you. It happened to a classmate of mine. She recognized her attacker when he raped her because she had seen him following her before.

She never stopped to think he might rape her someday. She shouldn't have needed to suspect him.

UMass police cannot be everywhere at once to protect us from these sorts of crimes. You could be minding your own business, or just doing your job, and someone could attack you. You could be a pizza delivery guy, an RA or just an average student minding your own business. We're all potential victims with a lot less power to defend ourselves than we think we have. It's a violent world. Life is cheap.

If someone decides to whack you with a cane or push you up against a wall, or if a group of guys decide they want that bike you're riding, there is very little you can do except hope you don't get hurt or killed. Hopefully it won't happen to you. It's happened to others on this campus.

The next time you walk on campus at night, remember the police can't protect you. Remember that violence on this campus is both common and real. And remember Sharon Galligan.

The reality of life as an Israeli

He made a wrong turn. That was the mistake that Yehoushua Weisbrod made last week and he paid for it with his life.

An accountant from Tel Aviv, Weisbrod found himself in a bad section of Gaza by accident. The citizens of Rafa decided this man was the cause of all their troubles and proceeded to stone the car. After he lost control and crashed into a barrier, he was shot twice in the head by masked gunmen. So much for justice.

Amid the cries of human rights abuse in connection to the expulsion of 401 Palestines from the territories, we seem to have lost sight of the fact that there are two sides to this issue.

Of course, it's an easy world where there's one good guy, one bad guy and one can discern between the two. Unfortunately, life isn't that simple and it's time people stopped pointing fingers and started getting their facts straight.

In the picture-perfect world of Amherst, Israelis sit around street cafes while Palestinians wait on them hand and foot. But the reality is Israelis are in a constant security pressure cooker. The reality is most Israelis spend the years of their lives wondering where the next bomb will be, or whether a person they know will be stabbed in the night while on sentry duty. These are real fears and the people who feel them aren't monsters, but are like you and me. They just want peace.

I don't claim the Israeli government is just or right in everything they do. But the Rabin government is in a balancing act. It wants to please its citizens by adopting strict security measures; at the same time, it wants a phased peace plan with the Arabs. Everyone plays a part in this scenario and, whether you like it or not, this situation doesn't get better by trying to find the bad guy.

I'm pleading with people to understand that these are real problems of real people, not just empty rhetoric for us to throw around at Earthfoods over tofu and rice. If you don't believe me, try asking Yehoushua Weisbrod's widow.

UMass means mediocrity

Whether you are a fan or not, you have to admire what John Calipari has accomplished in his short tenure as UMass men's basketball coach.

Calipari inherited the worst basketball program in the country and in just his fourth season the team advanced to the final 16 of the NCAA tournament.

This past week they won their second straight regular season league championship. But this is not a sports story. It's about excellence and our university.

Tom

Calipari's program represents for me one of the many "nuggets of excellence" at UMass, most of which are otherwise obscured in a sea of mediocrity.

When you walk into the Mullins Center for a basketball game, there is an air of professionalism and excellence that you otherwise rarely feel on campus. Since Calipari, even the old Cage was always clean and competently managed. It was evident that someone had sweat the details.

Conversely, walk into almost any other building on campus today and you can feel the mediocrity. Filthy, worn-out classrooms, with a clock that hasn't worked for years.

Walk into the men's room on the second floor of the SUB and you'll find a broken, "shrink-wrapped" toilet with the stall door torn off. It's been like that for months.

In the Sept. 28, 1992 U.S. News & World Report article, "America's Best Colleges: How the Experts Rate 450 Schools," UMass/Amherst ranked down in the third quartile.

Reduced funding has been a huge problem, but just as significant, I think, is that the University is still run like most other government beaurocracies. There is no sense of urgency. No one is sweating the details.

In the latest issue of alumni magazine, Massachusetts, Calipari says, "The big word that I used my first year was 'unacceptable.' There were things that were being done here that were unacceptable to me. People would say, 'Well we've done 'em that way in the past,' and I'd say, 'Well that's why you've lost 10 years in a row.'"

As a UMass alum and now again a student after having been away for eight years, I find it unacceptable when the Registrar's Office sends me to Admissions, who sends me to CASIAC, who refers me to an Academic Dean who wants to send me back to Admissions just to determine whether a class I took in 1984 satisfies a General Education requirement.

Just when I think I should give up and return to the working world, I uncover another UMass "nugget of excellence" like the math department's drop-in center where competent, friendly students like Pam Niedzwiecki and Ulrica Wilson help a math-illiterate like me pass calculus.

Or chemistry professor Everett Reed, who has the most compassion and enthusiasm of any educator I have ever met. But caring and competent employees like Reed are not rewarded in this tired bureaucracy, whose priorities are all screwed-up!

In a misguided attempt at fiscal austerity, Reed, recently nominated for a Distinguished Teacher Award, has to negotiate with the departmental secretary before he can make photocopies for students.

The University needs to be run more like a business. Non-performing employees should be encouraged to leave. At the same time, the excellent ones must be recognized and compensated accordingly.

This is the time for the University to begin to distinguish itself again as an institution of national and global repute.

We will soon be hiring a new chancellor. Let's insist that he or she be a proven leader who will not tolerate mediocrity. Someone who sweats the details.

Our university is great but it could be so much better! Thanks Coach Cal. Thanks Pam and Ulrica. Thank you Mr. Reed.

Running from our freedom

Americans are losing their faith in freedom. The creators of our nation's binding document, the Constitution, would never have considered today's mainstream issues politically valid. Debates over censorship, smokers' rights and the legalization of marijuana wouldn't have received government attention during our country's infant years. The Constitution demanded an environment in which government intervention into the private choices of individuals was nonexistent.

Romin
THOMSON

At the time of its creation our forefathers determined that the cornerstone to a sustainable multicultural society was freedom. To insure the safety of this ideal, they created a bill of rights that would provide any individual with the ability to resist infringement of their freedoms.

Today, however, we run from those freedoms. We work feverishly to build excuses to limit people. We limit our ability to drink in public based on a fear we will abuse that right and harm surrounding civilians. We limit the volume of our car stereos' with the excuse that the loud sound prohibits the safe travel of emergency vehicles. We even limit our ability to wear revealing swimwear based on a fear people would forget beauty isn't only skin deep.

We have become a fearful society. We do not trust our neighbors and they do not trust us. The debate which centers around marijuana is a perfect example of our deteriorating faith in each other.

For the past 30 years our society has been discussing whether or not the prohibition of cannabis was ethically consistent with our nation's constitution. Hemp was deemed illegal long before the issue reached public attention, however. In fact, the legislation came about largely because of heavy lobbying by American paper companies who were threatened by its efficiency in the production of the product. As it began to enter mainstream society, people impressed by the recreational values of the plant began to speak out in favor of a change in the law.

They were met by a barrage of disapproving Americans who felt the nation would only fall apart if the people inside it were given so much power. Americans who favor liberation of hemp cite their belief in their civil liberties and their right to control their own bodies. They also cite the practical purposes of the plant as an incentive to build favor among the general population.

Those who oppose the movement fear that such a freedom would only lead to abusive behavior. They believe the legalization of cannabis would result in countless disasters resulting from a society of people walking around stoned. They are afraid of their neighbors. Afraid that people, when granted the ability to harm one another through the irresponsible intake of drugs, will choose to do so.

What 1993 America does not realize and 1780 America did is that a liberated nation, in which individuals are given supreme control over themselves and their surroundings, has a severe price associated with it. The traditional guidelines that U.S. citizens abide by demand that we place a large portion of our safety into the hands of the surrounding members of society. Prohibitionists need to see that an individualistic society in which personal liberation is maintained must be rooted in wide-scope societal responsibility. To insure the value of any of our rights, we must first exercise a faith in each others rights.

Candidate's statements false — SAO is invaluable organization

I am writing to express my concern over statements made by Jeff Turco (Collegian, March 4). It seems that Mr. Turco is not fond of the Student Activities Office and feels they are a waste of students' trust fund money. As editor in chief of the UMass yearbook, The Index, I work closely with the SAO and find their assistance invaluable.

Mr. Turco stated, "The idea behind that office is to address the importance and needs of the students themselves. Every member of the Student Activities Office has to be aware of that and believe in it." He goes on to say the office has exhibited hostility and a lack of caring toward students in the past. On many occasions I have seen members of the office stop what they are doing and even interrupt meetings to help do some last-minute paperwork for our senior portrait sessions.

The SAO has also arranged agreements with a multitude of businesses so student organizations can purchase items at the lowest possible cost and in case of trouble can assist in using legal action to collect money. Not only will the SAO help us get the best deals possible, they will also train students each semester to do it themselves.

In addition, The Index has an SAO advisor assigned to us who assists in running our organization through two weekly meetings and countless other run-ins during the week. Through Margaret Arsenault, our advisor, we get advice on staff management, financial planning and ways to make the book more marketable to the general student population.

I do agree that students pay too many fees on this campus and many of them are seemingly unnecessary. However, the SAO is one of the best investments on campus. The office helps all Registered Student Organizations on campus and as such helps maintain the diversity of opportunities that this university values so much. Jeff Turco obviously has never worked with the SAO or he would know of their value to the students of this university.

at a cost of approximately six dollars a ticket, according to Jay Sapovits, a sports columnist for the Rebel Yell, the student newspaper at UNLV.

"There are no lines at 4 a.m. for tickets," Sapovits said. "Students don't get the best seats, but they don't at any university."

The Thomas and Mack Center is funded by a state law known as the slot tax rebate. Every time a slot machine is pulled in Las Vegas, the center gets a percentage, according to Pat Christiansen, director of the center.

The University of North Carolina has the Dean E. Smith Dome, more commonly known as the Dean Dome. This 21,000-seat arena was built in 1986 at a cost of $33.5 million dollars.

The Dean Dome is privately funded by alumni contributions, according to Rick Brewer, the sports information director. It was originally built through alumni money and fundraising organizations.

The Dean Dome originally had problems with security and various other "bugs," but they have all been solved, Brewer said.

Mullins Center was built in 1992 at a cost of $52 million dollars. The arena seats 10,000 and 4,000 of those are students.

At UMass students stand in line with activity cards for free seating. The lines, such as the one on Tuesday morning, can stretch out for over two hours.

Other events at the Mullins have included the Ice Capades, Metallica, David Copperfield and Guns & Roses.

The center is funded by a $25 million dollar grant from the state, with the rest of the money to be paid by the university. Students will pay approximately $97 "Mullins fee" on their next year's tuition bill, according to University officials.

Weld names Coxe new environmental secretary

By EVE EPSTEIN
Associated Press

BOSTON — Trudy Coxe became involved in the environmental movement after watching the Spanish coastline succumb to rapid development in the 1970s.

"It left a real impact that a community can change very quickly, almost overnight," said Coxe, Gov. William F. Weld's pick for the new secretary of Environmental Affairs. "It's very hard to take it back to what it once was."

Coxe, 44, of Rhode Island, worked her way up the environmental ranks through citizen activism. She is the former director of Ocean and Coastal Resources Management for the Natinal Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration.

Coxe got her start as a volunteer with the Rhode Island group Save The Bay, rising eventually to become the 16,000-member organization's director.

"I started really as somebody with a heart for the environment, and really a great interest in it and some stories that disturbed me," she said.

Coxe, a registered Republican who made an unsuccessful GOP bid for Congress, will replace outgoing Secretary Susan Tierney, who has been nominated by President Clinton to be an assistant secretary of the U.S. Department of Energy.

The choice of Coxe won praise from the environmental lobbying group Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group.

"Trudy has unquestionably environmental credentials," said Amy Perry of MassPIRG. "She's tough, aggressive and smart, making her a match for any opponent."

The Massachusetts Audubon Society also lauded the governor's choice.

"She brings a wealth of knowledge and experience in open space protection, wastewater treatment and source reduction," said Paul Wingle, a spokesman for the Audubon Society.

Crowe said her experience working to clean Narragansett Bay showed her ways that business groups and environmentalists can work together to solve pollution problems.

"My interests and my experience tell me that often the conflicts aren't as serious as the rhetoric would say," she said. "I have seen too many example in which the business community working with the environmental community can really solve problems in a very constructive way."

Coxe lost the race for a U.S. House seat in 1990, after winning a three-way Rhode Island GOP primary race. She was executive director of Save the Bay from 1979 to 1990, and was appointed the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration's director of ocean and coastal resource management in 1991.

Coxe officially takes over her $70,666-post in Environmental Affairs March 22.

Esckilson also said the way the arena is set up, whether it be "end stage, center stage, or half-house," which refer to the location of the stage in the arena, also greatly effects the size and distribution of the staff.

Esckilson said metal directors were considered necessary due to Massachusetts laws which allow pat-down searches of patrons.

There is more to security than the staff at the gates and police officers, there are five groups of security personnel, who cover the arena itself as well as being responsible for traffic control and parking, Esckilson said.

The first group is the Mullins Center's own staff, which consists mostly of UMass students. This staff is augmented by 20 to 30 contracted security officers from local security companies, who are "experienced in these kinds of events," and thus assist the less experienced student staff.

Event promoters and performers also have their own security, which travels with them and covers areas such as the dressing rooms and backstage areas, Esckilson said. This staff also travels ahead to meet with people like Esckilson to help arrange the show.

The fifth group is the University Police, who act as the "umbrella" of official authority at an event, Esckilson said. Any arrests or ejections are referred to them, and handled by them. For a large event, the Amherst and Hadley police departments also assist the campus public safety officers.

Having met last week with Bill Greer, director of security for Guns 'n Roses, Esckilson said Greer said he was "pleased" with the new Center, and "looking forward to coming here and putting on a safe and secure show."

"We are a nation that glorifies the abuse of other drugs, like tobacco and alcohol," Evans said. "And drug prohibition is exactly what is creating the abuse which takes place."

"I definitely think it should be legalized," sophmore Heather Barom said. "Alcohol is much more abusive."

Liberty Provost, a prospective UMass student who attended the rally, said he felt it the rally's atmosphere was positive. He also said he believed the referendum would be victorious.

Some students, however, do not agree with the proposal. Freshman art major Ken Palmer said he felt its passage would lead to bigger, more harmful drugs.

"Legalization would encourage people to smoke," Palmer said.

The Coalition had already scheduled a victory rally which will take place today on the steps of the Student Union.

Jonathan Kelly, a junior English major said he believes that a trial period of marijuana legalization is necessary.

"Maybe a time period of three or four years of legalization would be the best idea," Kelly said.

Lance Brown, the new president of the Coalition, ended the rally by saying, "If you consider yourself an open-minded person, you will vote 'yes' on question number 2."

Lederle Blasts Abuse of Grass

President John Lederle today blasted the "foolhardy use of grass" by UMass students.

Lederle noted recent health reports on the dangers of prolonged abuse of grass and called on deans and dorm counselors to "keep the campus from going to pot".

"The path of the straight and narrow is not that difficult if students would not blow their minds", Lederle told the audience behind the Unnion.

In response to the blast, the Mother of Voices published a special edition criticising Lederle for his "facist intrusion of the personal lives of the students".

The Civil Liberties Union said that it would look into possible violations of the Constitution and reasserted its position to defend the rights of the individual.

Contacted about the abuse of grass on campus, the Greeks reported no knowledge of the situation. Orchard Hill students said that many of their numbers were particularly partial to grass in its many forms.

A noted UMass sociologist said that the use of grass is a social phenomenon caused by acute alienation. "Students, by avoiding paved walks and crossing grassy strips, are showing their rejection of established institutions of society," he said.

Lederle said he was presently consulting with University architects about the possibility of paving the entire campus as one means of ending the grass problem.

Serbs block aid convoy

Last Muslim position falls to Serbs

By DAVID CRARY
Associated Press

SARAJEVO, Bosnia-Herzegovina — Serbian forces backed by artillery reportedly closed in today on two more towns in eastern Bosnia, and a U.N. aid convoy was blocked by Serb officials for a second day.

Also today, six U.S. Air Force cargo planes dropped 42 tons of food and medical supplies over Srebrenica, the 10th mission of the American relief effort.

Serbs were taking aim at two towns, meanwhile, Srebrenica and Konjevic Polje.

The last Muslim defense position outside Srebrenica fell to advancing Serbs who were within two miles of the town, said local Bosnian army spokesman Ibrahim Becirevic, reached by a.m. radio today from Zagreb, Croatia.

A Bosnian Serb military statement issued Tuesday said Serb forces seized two strategic hills about six miles north of Srebrenica.

A U.N. convoy headed to the Konjevic Polje area near Srebrenica to evacuate up to 75 sick and wounded Muslims was blocked for a second day by local Serb commanders at Zornik on the Serbian border, said Tony Land, the representative in Sarajevo of the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees.

He said the main dispute with the Serbs focused on who could be evacuated. The Serb commander insisted soldiers could not be included, but Land said that would exclude males age 18 to 60, a "large proportion" of the seriously wounded.

U.N. land convoys to eastern Bosnia have been repeatedly turned back by Serbs, prompting the United States to start dropping aid from the air last week.

U.N. refugee officials were negotiating with Serbs to secure passage for the trucks and an aid convoy on Thursday to Srebrenica, where a World Health Organization doctor reported 97 people were close to death.

Muslims were trapped in Konjevic Polje after Serbs routed them last week from nearby Cerska.

Sadik Hajdarevic, a defense official reached today by ham radio in Konjevic Polje, said the town was under heavy artillery attack and that more than 100 people were killed.

The report, like most from the region, could not be independently confirmed.

were reported on campus that same night, but all three incidences are under investigation by the UMass Community Disorders Unit. The CDU is a special police unit which investigates civil rights violations, hate crimes and sexual assaults.

One student, who wished to remain anonymous, alleged that he saw his friend being assaulted and then robbed of his forest green mountain bike.

"Nothing racial [was] said by either side," he said.

Police report that the individual was shaken from his bicycle and then beaten by seven to eight male subjects on Infirmary Way. One of the attackers allegedly struck the biker on the back with a cane, police said.

The victim said although he called the police right away, he chose not to go to Health Services.

Coordinator of Third World Affairs Nelson Acosta said a harsh penalty, such as expulsion from school, should be given to anyone who assaults students.

"I am concerned about [the assaults] because I sense a little bit of tension out there. It only takes small sparks to start a fire," Acosta said. "Whoever assaults regardless of color, I support the filing of charges. . ."

In the other incident, two UMass students, neither of whom wished to be identified, alleged that they were assaulted while waiting in line for a party at Butterfield Residence Hall in Central. Rachel Dardinski, the resident assistant on duty that evening in Butterfield, said she "didn't hear about any assaults here. If the police were involved, I probably would have known."

Chancellor Richard O'Brien said he does not know the specifics of these alleged attacks, but added that he has been watching the amount of violence grow on campus. Although O'Brien said he has increased security in the last month, he added that he does not want to create a police state.

"I don't want a policeman pounding on every corner," O'Brien said.

O'Brien added that most information he has received is from senior staff and news accounts.

Police Chief Jack Luippold said UMass police are "vigorously" investigating the situation and had no further information. No arrests have been made, police reports said.

Studies reveal homosexuality may be genetic

CAMBRIDGE — Inherited homosexuality dominated the discussion at a Harvard Medical School conference over the weekend, as doctors debated the origin of sexual orientation.

The cause of homosexuality is "an open and unanswered question," said Dean Hamer, chief of the gene structure and regulation section at the National Cancer Institute.

But Hamer said his research indicates that sexual orientation may be hereditary on the mother's side.

"Maternal transmission was more than expected by chance" in studies, Hamer said.

Dr Richard Pillard, professor of psychiatry and director of the family studies laboratory at the Boston University School of Medicine, said studies also have found that gay men are five times more likely to have brothers who are gay as heterosexual men.

Identical twins who are brought up apart also have been found to have remarkable similar styles of sexuality, he said.

"Sexuality must have some biological basis," said Pillard, who called himself the first openly gay psychiatrist in United States.

About 90 people attended Saturday's symposium on the biological nature of homosexuality and the psychological development of homosexual men and women.

"The biological explanation of homosexuality, or genetic, or choice is the question of today," said Dr. Marshall Forstein, a member of the medical school faculty and a psychiatrist.

Simon LeVay, chairman of the steering committee of the Institute of Gay and Lesbian Studies, said finding a scientific basis for homosexuality would help "persuade the world that gays and lesbians are normal human beings."

LeVay, who is on leave from the Salk Institute, said there were also drawbacks to the research.

"The negative is that the idea that identifying a biological base of homosexuality is that it makes it like a disease, and this could lead people to try to change homosexuals medically.

"The positive is that knowledge can be used for good and to overcome prejudices against gay people, which are based on moral and religious beliefs."

Author Camille Paglia expressed concerns about the future of the study of homosexuality's origins, saying she feared it would become political, not scientific.

"I'm disappointed in the overly gay representation here," said Paglia, author of "Sexual Personae" and "Sex, Art and American Culture."

"I don't like the feeling of a clubhouse. That is not science. There's too much political correctness here," Paglia said.

And April Martin, clinical supervisor of the Yeshiva University doctoral program in psychology, warned that debating the scientific origins of homosexuality would distract attention from human rights issues.

Woman relives history

Virginia native seeks to recreate past

By STACI MILBOUER
Associated Press

NASHUA, N.H. — Shelby Shand has lived and breathed women's history every say since she was a girl growing up in Richmond, Va.

Her home in Windham is filled with little oddities from the past — a Victorian bracelet made from human hair, a woman's evening bag fashioned from ostrich feathers, a mourning fan made of black crepe paper.

In her spare time, she reads historical biographies, and when on vacation, she travels to museums and historic landmarks.

She also makes her living out of her love of the past.

For six years, Shand has dressed up in original period costumes and given talks about women's history to schools, clubs and any other group who hires. Her travels take her mostly through New Hampshire, but occasionally other parts of New England as well. She adapts her 45 to 65 minute presentation to the age level and interests of each group.

Shand studied history in college and taught history and social studies in Virginia.

Her repertoire includes women from the American colonial period, the American Revolution, pioneer period, Victorian era, the Civil War, and some special programs, including a multicultural program, New Hampshire women and pioneer writer Laura Ingalls Wilder.

It's a labor of love for Shand, who sometimes endures physical pain to preserve historical accuracy.

For her presentation about Civil War women, she wore a dress made of a wool blend material with a roller print pattern, which she said was made in the Merrimack Valley about 135 years ago.

Beneath the yards of heavy fabric, she was trussed up in a bone corset circled by a huge hoop skirt.

Between short breaths, Shand said, "I always talk about the clothing first. I explain the dangers of the clothing for women. Some corsets were so tight it caused damage to ribs and pelvic bones. It also caused difficulties in breathing. That's why I sound like I'm gasping right now. After I put this dress on, it takes me 10 minutes to regulate my breathing.

"I never accept anything to eat or drink at a program, because it's difficult to get anything down your throat wearing this, and going to the bathroom — well, it's almost impossible," she said.

"But I feel I have to dress the way the women I talk about dressed, because when I'm in costume I move like the women in that period moved and feel the way those women felt."

Shand also emphasized the socio-historical significance of the outfits she wears during a performance — she has about 15 in all.

She explained that while the material in the Civil War-period dress was most likely manufactured in a Merrimack Valley textile mill, as was much of the fabric of the time, the raw cotton came from the South. Once that raw cotton was made into cloth, it was shipped back to the South and sold to be made into garments.

"Southerners had to bear the stigma of slavery, while the North reaped the benefits. That was just one of the causes of the was," she said.

Shand includes both Northern and Southern women in her talk about the war between the states.

"This is not political," she said. "I just want the people who come to see me to get a feeling for the way women lived and the contributions they made to our history."

AG designate Reno praised by Democrats

By MIKE ROBINSON
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Attorney General designate Janet Reno said today that despite her opposition to capital punishment she recognizes the duty of prosecutors to seek the death penalty for killers who are "totally contemptuous of human life."

"If the law requires it, if the procedure is right, you ask for it," she said in her second day of testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee.

President Clinton today joined other Democrats in praising the 54-year old Miami prosecutor's performance before the committee.

"I think she did real well yesterday," Clinton said. "I'm proud of her." Asked if he thought Reno would be confirmed, he remarked, "I sure hope so."

Reno said if it were up to her she might even go further, noting the in Florida she urged testing of what would be handgun purchasers to determine whether they know how to use the weapon safely.

"That's been my personal position in Florida. But, as you know, I'm now reflecting the president's position," she testified.

Reno appears headed for quick confirmation.

Democrats, who were dismayed by the Clinton administration's stumbling search for an attorney general, have been all smilesd over the Reno nomination.

"It could not have gone more smoothly thus far," Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., told reporters Tuesday after an initial day of confirmation hearings before Senate Judiciary Committee. "But it's not over until it's over."

No other witnesses were scheduled to testify before the committee today.

Hilmy said the shooting at Al-Rahman Mosque, frequented by extremists, began after evening prayers and iftar, the meal with which Muslim break the daylong fast of Ramadan, the holy month now in its third week.

Police had been tipped that the extremists planned to march from the mosque "in an anti-government demonstration," Hilmy said.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Take your time when making major decisions. If someone makes new demands, stand your ground! Your intuition is right on target. Steer clear of foolish choices.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Dwelling on past mistakes is counterproductive. Look for better ways to spend your leisure time. Romance provides a stimulating diversion. A feeling of optimism is in the air.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Knowledge and diplomacy are your greatest assets now. Avoid controversy and controntations today. A new sense of purpose is part of the picture. Let loved ones know your intentions.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Business may take you on a long trip. If overseas travel is involved, get your passport updated. Romance takes a serious turn. You may be thinking of setting a wedding date.

LEO (July 23-Aug.22): Opportunity knocks! Avoid throwing caution to the wind. Be on your guard when doing business with a competitor. Otherwise, your enthusiasm could cause you to go too far.

VIRGO (Aug.23-Sept.22): Take advantage of any new opportunities that come your way. Move quickly but be certain you have your facts straight if negotiating a business agreement.

LIBRA (Sept.23-Oct.22): Consenting too hastily to someone's terms may cost you precious funds or bring disappointment. Put practical matters first. Family life continues to be fairly contented.

SCORPIO (Oct.23-Nov.21): Someone behind the scenes may try to disrupt your business plans. Deal only with people in authority. Schedules will be changed. Seek exciting diversion this evening.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov.22-Dec.21): A heavier work load is indicated. Face up to your responsibilities squarely. This is no time to shirk your duties. Your job performance is important to your future financial security.

CAPRICORN (Dec.22-Jan.19): A day when you might be tempted to splurge on items you do not really need. Exercise self-discipline. Doing the right thing will get easier with practice!

AQUARIUS (Jan.20-Feb.18): Developing new skills helps you avoid burnout. Cheer up! A positive mental attitude will make you a winner. A visit to a friend brings you into contact with someone new and exciting.

PISCES (Feb.19-March 20): A financial or romantic upset could have you seeing red; do not be rash or plunge ahead impulsively. Calm, businesslike conduct will win the day — others see that you are special.

Women's gymnastics ends home season in style

By ARTHUR STAPLETON
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's gymnastics team closed out its home season last night in style, defeating Northeastern University 187.80-186.10.

The Minutewomen, dedicating the night to their three seniors, were led by a stunning performance on bars (48.25) which broke the school record.

Sophomores Erica Baum (9.15) and Gina Demeo (9.50), junior Angela Jent (9.60), seniors Lisa-Beth Cronen (9.65) and Tammy Marshall (her 9.80 broke her own individual school record) and freshman Shaheda Keels (9.70) wowed the crowd, including head coach Alfie Mitchell.

"This team is fantastic. Bars were great because we have seven gymnasts who are equally as good. When they all hit, from top to bottom, you see what happens. They are unconscious," Mitchell said.

Cronen and Keels topped the field for UMass as they both had their season-high meets. Keels broke her career high in the all-around for the second straight meet, scoring a 37.80. She said she hopes that she can continue her improvement heading into the Atlantic 10 Championships, and possibly reach a score of 38.

"This is the first time I stuck everything, the first time all year. Things are starting to fall into place, things are getting better," Keels said.

Mitchell said he has seen continuous improvement in Keels over the entire season.

"Each week Shaheda gets that much better, that much more confident, and it shows. When she throws her release on bars, it is out of this world," Mitchell said.

The three seniors bid their farewell to Boyden and its fans for the final time as they left the mat after the competition.

"It was a great meet for me. It was a little sad when I think back on everything, but I'm glad I ended here with a good meet," Cronen said.

"It was sad because it was the last home meet, I wish I could have done all-around. I couldn't because of my knee, so right now it was the safest thing to do," Marshall said.

"I'm happy with the way the team did. We were consistent on bars, consistent on beam, and we're gonna take that to A-10's," senior Abby May said.

UMass travels to West Virginia for the A-10's next week.

Men place second in final home meet

By ANDREW BRYCE
Collegian Staff

Fatigue set in for the University of Massachusetts men's gymnastics team on Tuesday night as they lost to Radford College (Va.) and defeated the University of Vermont at Boyden Gym.

It was the second meet in three days for the Minutemen, following the New England Open on Sunday. Radford defeated UMass 251.70-247.90, with Vermont scoring 214.70.

"It was a tough meet for the guys," head coach Roy Johnson said. "They were real tired. It was close, though."

For UMass, the high bar scores continue to improve. The Minutemen scored 40.30, good enough to defeat Radford and Vermont. The score also gave UMass a season high team point total in the event.

Four Minutemen competitors scored over 8.00, another season best. Sophomore Jason Lee scored an 8.50, sophomore Tim Smith and junior Jay Santos each had an 8.25, and freshman Steve Goldman had an 8.05.

Santos is turning out to be one of the Minutemen's most consistent performers. The junior co-captain took second on the parallel bars (8.80) and tied for second on the vault (8.90).

In the final home meet of his career, Steve Christensen won the pommel horse with a 9.25. The score was well off his 9.73 average in the event (as of last week), yet the senior co-captain still managed to defeat Radford's Dave Trites by four tenths of a point.

Christensen also took third on the floor exercise with a score of 9.05. Sophomore Stu Backer tied for second on the rings with an 8.85.

Johnson said he understood that his team was tired, and was pleased with the effort.

"These guys are great. They did a great job. I wish they were fresher. Radford is a good team. Many had exams this week, and many were tired from Sunday's meet. It was a close meet, and could've gone either way," Johnson said.

Hoop review, preview

Two weeks ago, this column congratulated University of Rhode Island head coach Al Skinner for his steadfastness in the suspension of point guard Jason Alexander.

The compliment and the respect for Coach Skinner have both been revoked. By not openly chastising his players for their New York Knick-like behavior during the final minutes of Monday night's massacre, Skinner is only condoning such actions in the future.

Sean P.
HAYDEN

The NCAA should review the tapes and take some sort of action against Rhody forward Abdul Fox for his flagrant attempt to injure Lou Roe with a fist to the groin. Fox should receive some kind of Rod Sellers-ish one game tournament suspension — be it NCAA or NIT. It's either that or three minutes in the steel cage with Roe.

Billy Packer recently said that no big man has ever improved more in one year than Seton Hall's Luther Wright. No disrespect to Wright, but it's painfully obvious that Packer hasn't seen Bryant Reeves of Oklahoma State play this year.

Last year, Reeves was a freshman on a senior-dominated Cowboy squad. And to be perfectly honest, he was nothing more than a space-filling slob. This year, the 7-foot, 285-pound sophomore is leading the Big Eight in scoring (19.7 points per game), rebounding (10.2) and field-goal percentage (62.4). My, what a difference a year makes.

Let's settle this once and for all. Mike Tranghese, you take Curley, Moten, Cain, Dehere and Donyell Marshall.

Ron Bertovich, you can have Roe, Blunt, Moore, McKie and Harper Williams.

Please, what a laugher. Both Harp and Roe would have double-doubles before Curley even left the ground for the tip-off.

And now for the tournament:

Indiana, Michigan and North Carolina have all but sewn up number one seeds. The only question is: Where's Michigan going?

The Wolverines will head out West if the committee gives either Kentucky or Vanderbilt the number one in the Southeast. If Arizona gets the number one out West, Big Blue is going South to either the Magic Kingdom or Nashville, Tenn. Jalen Rose could be going from the crack house to the Opry House.

Western Kentucky's upset of New Orleans in the Sun Belt finals means that conference will get two teams in this year's tournament. While that's all well and good through a 48-57 (.457) non-league record in 1989-90, A-10 teams registered a 71-26 (.732) mark this season.

"We also all went out and scheduled better and better teams," Calipari said. "We all learned from Temple that you need to play good teams to get respect."

Temple coach John Chaney, whose Owls played the most difficult non-league schedule in the country, said, "The only way to get it done is to go out and schedule tough teams. If you get your ass whipped, then you tuck your ass back in and go home."

Being able to play the championship game in a first rate facility, such as the 9,493-seat Mullins Center, is also a major image booster for the league. UMass moved from its cozy 4,058-seat Curry Hicks Cage to the Mullins Center in February.

Calipari, when asked by a Philadelphia reporter if he wishes the game could be played in the Cage, one of the most difficult places in the country for a visiting team to play, said:

"They didn't say anything to you?" Calipari joked. "We are playing in the Cage. We sold 9,000 seats and we're going to be in the Cage.

"Seriously, you are going to love the Mullins Center. Across the country, people will see the A-10 playing in a building as good as any building in any conference in the country," he said. "It's a pro arena with only 9,500 seats. The arena is important for the league's image."

for the Hilltoppers, it could hurt Atlantic 10 bubble teams like URI and George Washington.

A healthy Alan Henderson means Bob Knight and his Hoosiers will be whooping it up on Bourbon St. come April.

Ditto for Grant Hill and the Duke Blue Devils.

Seton Hall is playing as well as anyone in the country right now. Look for big things from on-again off-again on-again Pirate guard Brian Caver.

Tarheels. 'Nuff said. Look for the 'Heels against the Hall in the finals with Dean Smith not needing an errant Fred Brown pass to win his second NCAA title.

points in the half.

In the second half, the Minutewomen held on for the victory by hitting their clutch free throws down the stretch. When the final buzzer sounded, UMass had itself a 76-68 victory.

Gurile finished the contest with 26 points while fellow freshman Octavia Thomas scored 18 and snagged 12 rebounds.

On Feb. 6 in Morgantown, West Virginia, it was truly a reversal of fortunes as the Mountaineers came out with fire in their eyes and had a 10-point lead at the half (32-22).

In the second half, West Virginia extended their lead and came away with a 67-51 victory. Mountaineer guard Lori Quertinmont was the game's high scorer as she pumped in 22 points.

The Minutewomen, who lost despite outshooting West Virginia 40.7 percent to 35.5 percent, were led by Thomas (17 points, 11 caroms), senior Kim Kristofik (16 points) and Gurile (15 points).

Now it will be a neutral site for the two teams with the stakes raised to a new level.

For UMass the probable starting five will be Gurile, Thomas and Kristofik up front and freshmen Tricia Hopson and Kim Gregory in the backcourt.

Off the bench for UMass will be junior Maleeka Valentine, sophomore Francie Hansen and senior Gloria Nevarez.

West Virginia will be led by Christy Cooper (13.7 points a game), Quertinmont (12.5 ppg) and Anna Tillman (12.0 ppg.)

A-10 Notes: Here is a look at the the battles on tap today in the Tournament:

Game No. 1: Rhode Island (6) vs. St. Joseph's (3)
Game No. 2: UMass (5) vs. WVU (4)
Game No. 3: G. Washington (2) vs. Temple (7)
Game No. 4: Rutgers (1) vs. St. Bonaventure (8)

In the Semifinals it will be:
Game No. 6: Game 2 winner vs. Game 4 winner
Game No. 7: Game 1 winner vs. Game 3 winner

In the Finals it will be:
Game No. 8: Game 6 winner vs. Game 7 winner

■ men's hoop

The Owls have battled through the problems and behind A-10 Player of the Year Aaron McKie, a junior forward averaging 21 points and 6.3 rebounds a game, and sophomore point guard Rick Brunson, averaging 13.7 points and 3.4 assists a game, are on the verge of claiming their fifth tournament championship.

Massachusetts is looking to repeat as tournament champions, after defeating West Virgina last season, 97-91, at the Curry Hicks Cage. The Minutemen, after dropping two league games in a row in late February, have peeled off four straight victories.

"UMass personifies what team basketball is all about," Chaney said. "They are well-schooled and well-oiled."

Chaney cited the emergence of point guard Derek Kellogg (5.1 points, 5.2 assists a game) and the continued dominance of center Harper Williams (15.9 points, 8.2 rebounds) as the keys to the Minutemen's success.

"Derek is not going to get you 20 points but he can bring your team up and down the court well enough," Chaney said. "And Harper, my team doesn't even know how to cover him, he is just everywhere."

Temple defeated UMass in Jan., 52-44, in Philadelphia, but on the strength of a Tony Barbee buzzer-beater, UMass pulled out a 52-50 victory in the Cage later that month. UMass defeated Temple for the first time in 21 attempts last season, prompting widespread celebration in Amherst, but UMass forward Lou Roe said Temple is now just another game.

"In the past Temple was a big rivarly, but now they are just another good team we play," Roe said.

While the winner will receive an automatic bid to the NCAA Tournament, both teams are considered locks to receive at-large bids to the Tournament.

Temple's match-up zone defense has historically given UMass fits and with its only true threat to penetrate the zone, guard Mike Williams, out with a broken hand, the Minutemen will need to shoot well from the outside.

"Temple usually spanks us," Calipari said. "So this is going to be a very hard game for us to win, even though its on our home court."

SPORTS NOTICE

Students wanting to participate in the NCAA Tournament ticket drawing should drop off their student activity cards at the Curry Hicks Cage no later than noon Friday. Students are asked to place their phone numbers on the cards, and will be notified Monday. Call 5-0810 if there are questions.

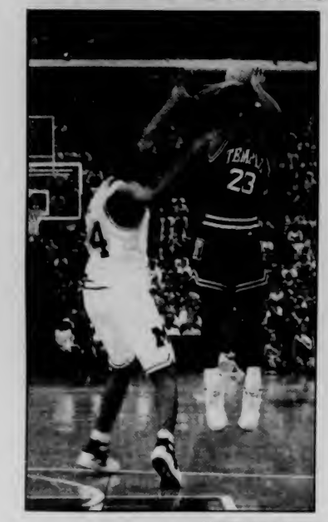
UMass battles Owls for Atlantic 10 title



COURTESY TEMPLE UNIVERSITY

Temple junior guard Aaron McKie (21 points per game) won the Atlantic 10 Player of the Year award . . .

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

For University of Massachusetts basketball fans, it cannot get much better than tonight.

The Minutemen (22-6) will host long-time nemesis Temple (17-11) in the Atlantic 10 Championship game at the Mullins Center (9:30 p.m., ESPN). The game's winner will receive an automatic bid to the NCAA Tournament.

No. 20 Massachusetts, the A-10 regular season champion, will be tested by a streaking Owl club which has won seven of its last eight games.

"Temple is playing better basketball than any team in our conference, maybe better than any team in the country," UMass coach John Calipari said.

Temple, which is ranked No. 15 in the latest RPI Power Index (UMass was No. 17), the ratings service the NCAA Tournament selection committee uses, looked dead in mid-February when its record fell to 9-9 following back-to-back home losses to Wake Forest and George Washington.

Temple was also minus starting point guard Vic Carstarphan (broken leg), who may see limited time tonight and center Frazier Johnson, who flunked out of school.

The Owls, who play one of the most difficult schedules in the country (Florida State, Boston College, Cincinnati, Kansas State, Florida and Alabama-Birmingham), responded by turning up their intensity and blowing out No. 23 Tulane and Memphis State.

"John Chaney has done an unbelievable job to get to this level after everyone wrote them off," Calipari said. "I thought we played a tough schedule but then I saw Temple's and I said, 'He's got to be crazy.' But the schedule has prepared them well for the post season."

Chaney, who starts all underclassmen and is only six deep, said, "At one stretch our team looked downtrodden, like we were going to fall apart. Heck, when you schedule you don't expect the problems we had."

Team goes from obscurity to "In Your Face"

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

If five nationally televised games wasn't enough for University of Massachusetts basketball fans, get ready for the ultimate "In Your Face" experience.

After four rigorous days of following the Minutemen from plane to bus to hotel to arena, the "All Sports Network" will compile a short segment on the team to be shown on Friday.

ESPN college basketball program director Tom Okjadian contacted UMass head coach John Calipari about the proposition, and Calipari was very excited about the idea.

So with a cameraman, a microphone/sound man and a director, you may imagine the coverage the team received.

"They covered us from the bus to the hotel, inside the hotel, at the meals, at the practice, at the locker room, team meetings, when you turned around to go to the bathroom, they were right there," associate coach Bill Bayno said.

"The first couple of days, we kind of noticed and they were there all the time, but by the end it was like second nature," senior forward Tony Barbee said. "Some of these guys are clowns, they love being in front of the camera."

"I think it was a good experience," said assistant coach John Robic. "We told our guys, we said if it gets to be a disturbance, tell us, and we cut them off. We had to a couple of times — it just got to be too much. They got carried away in the locker room."

The Minutemen had graced ESPN with their presence on four occasions: Thursday, Dec. 2 angainst Florida State; against Cincinnati at Springfield Civic Center on Thursday, Jan. 7; against SW Louisiana Friday, Jan. 29 and West Virginia on Thursday, Feb. 4. In addition, UMass played DePaul on ABC Sunday, Jan. 24.

Tonight's 9:30 p.m. game against Temple at the Mullins Center will also be televised on ESPN, but nothing compares to a feature devoted to the team.

"ESPN, you know, it's gonna be first rate," Robic said. "They are not going to spend all that money to follow us for five days and not put on a great product."

"At first we were nervous," said Kennard Robinson.

"We got used to them," sophomore forward Lou Roe said. "We started talking to the camera more as the weekend came around."

"Sometimes they followed individuals," Robinson said. "They followed me and Derek [Kellogg] to the mall one day, and they were asking us questions. It was a fun experience."

The blanket coverage by ESPN and, as soon as the NCAA tournament starts, CBS, is a far cry from the last time UMass squared off against the Owls in the A-10 Championship, back in March 1990.

Television stations in Boston literally stumbled upon the Minutemen as they shocked the Atlantic 10 and advanced to the finals against a Temple squad with at least two future NBA players, Mark Macon and Donald Hodge.

WCVB Channel 5 in Boston interviewed Calipari at Temple's McGonigle Hall because they happened to be in town for a Bruins-Flyers hockey game. Since then, the basketball program really has come a long way.

"I don't think it's too much hype," said Ted Cottrell. "I think we've built the program up to this level."

Most of the players said they did not feel that the coverage was too suffocating. They said they did not want to be embarrassed on national television, which means they hope that Calipari's tirade during the first half of the St. Bonaventure game is left on the cutting room floor.

"When I get yelled at, just don't put it on camera," Cottrell said.

. . . But tonight's game could very likely rest in the hands of on-again, off-again sophomore forward Lou Roe.

Atlantic 10 gets respect

UMass, Temple make league a winner

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

This season the Atlantic 10 has emerged, at least statistically, as one of the premier college basketball conferences in the nation. However, a computer ranking does not guarantee the image of respectability.

Tonight, the A-10 has a chance to enhance that image as it showcases its two most recognizable programs, Temple and Massachusetts, on national television in a beautiful, new arena, the William D. Mullins Memorial Center.

"We are pleased to have this match-up," league Commissioner Ron Bertovich said. "This has been the most successful season in A-10 history and we are looking forward to a great game."

The A-10 is ranked as the fourth strongest conference in the nation by the RPI power rankings, which the NCAA Selection Committee uses to seed teams. Only the ACC, the Big Eight and the Big Ten are ranked higher. The Big East, which long overshadowed the A-10, is ranked No. 6.

Massachusetts (22-6) is ranked No. 20 by the Associated Press and No. 17 by the RPI. Temple (17-11) is ranked No. 15 by the RPI.

"I don't need a computer to tell me this is one of the toughest leagues in the nation," UMass coach John Calipari said. "I've had to play (16) games in it this season."

It has been the non-conference success of league teams which has sparked the rise in the league, though. After suffering

Women face W. Virginia in A-10 quarterfinals

By JEFF CROFTS
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts women's basketball team knows going into the Atlantic 10 tournament that it can play with or beat any team in the conference. It is just a matter of execution and playing their own game for Joannie O'Brien's Minutewomen.

UMass (11-14, 6-8 A-10), the No. 5 seed, will be facing of with No. 4 West Virginia (11-15, 7-7 A-10) today at George Washington (3:00 p.m.).

Looking over UMass' record in the conference, it is readily apparent that they have the talent to advance in the A-10s.

The Minutewomen split their season series at 1-1 with every team in the conference except for No. 1 seed Rutgers University, to whom they lost twice.

At the Curry Hicks Cage on January 29, UMass defeated West Virginia 76-68. The Minutemen used a big run to go up 23-4 midway through the first half.

The Mountaineers rallied a little bit towards the end of the first half. At intermission, UMass had a comfortable 35-19 lead. Freshman center Melissa Gurile scorched the nets for 16

GUNS N' ROSES

The loudest, nastiest band in rock & roll is set to invade the new Mullins Center

By GREG SUKIENNIK
Collegian Staff

I guess my favorite Guns N' Roses song has always been the acoustic version of "You're Crazy" off GN'R Lies. What this has to do with the Gunners' upcoming visit to the Mullins Center I'm not sure. Maybe it's "you're crazy if you miss the show," or "you're crazy if you go without cotton wadding for your poor ears."

Then again, craziness is more or less an apt way to describe Guns N' Roses. Since the band's major label debut Appetite for Destruction first caught fire in 1988, the band has been in the news, and not always for their music.

Guns N' Roses has two reputations in concert. One is that they are the loudest, nastiest band in all of rock and roll. Their fans certainly agree. The other? That they show up late for shows, rely on a lot of volume and distortion and that occasionally people get violent at their shows. The last assertion isn't fair — how can a band be held responsible for its fans? — but that's what's been said.

Well, the hell with the controversy. If you've bought a ticket to this Saturday's show (8:30 p.m. start — and GN'R will go on whenever they damn well please) it's not because "Axl did this" or "Axl did that." They're going because of the music. The true test of any band is how it plays live on stage, and if you've got a ticket you'll be able to see for yourself this Saturday.

It's been about a year and a half since GN'R released Use Your Illusion, the long-awaited two album set and follow-up to their first one and a half albums (part of Lies, you'll recall, was a re-issue of older live material). Essentially, reviews of Illusion have been mixed. But what can you do for an encore after conquering the world, anyway?

Appetite for Destruction did just that. While some of the newer songs, such as "Don't Cry" (either set of lyrics) and "November Rain" have gotten extensive airplay and the heaviest of MTV rotations, the band's benchmark continues to be Appetite, with the four studio songs off of Lies placing a close second.

Why is this so? It's not like GN'R messed with the formula, although some personel changes (Stephen Adler, Izzy Stradlin) have gone down, and not on the best of terms. Same band, same style, same confrontational spirit. What's different?

It's hard to pin down, but the music on Appetite

Too Much Joy
Pearl Street
March 9, 1993

On Tuesday night during the drive back to my house after seeing the power grunge pop band Too Much Joy perform at Pearl Street, I almost decided to quit school. I was totally ready to just pack a bag, fill the tank and spend the rest of my life following this band around the country. I was ready to become, a Joyster.

To try and capture the feeling of this show in words alone is almost impossible. In a preview interview the band promised their fans, "the best Too Much Joy show ever" and they certainly didn't disappoint.

The line outside of Pearl Street was over a 100 people deep when I arrived at 8:30 p.m. Multitudes of the band's fans were dressed in TMJ regalia which they purchased from other shows and it was evident that a lot of them were seasoned veterans of the TMJ scene.

As usual some fans had travelled great distances to be there, including Jay Buckley, a senior history major from North Adams State College and two of his friends. When asked why they'd travelled so far on a Tuesday night Buckley replied, "I've been in a bad mood all week and I need some Joy."

Buckley's friend John Donovan, also from N.A.S.C. said, "Buckley made me come. He's been force feeding me TMJ songs for a week now, so that I can sing along with everyone else."

And the third traveller from N.A.S.C., a weary looking Physics major named Jason Demers said, "I don't know why I'm here. We were drinking pretty hard this afternoon and the last thing I remember is that we were going out for smokes. When I woke up in the car — we were here, cool!"

As soon as the doors opened the crowd filled the room and quickly grew to over 200 strong. Opening band Overwhelming Colorfast started the night off strong.

This psychedelic-pop-punk band from San Francisco appears on Relativity records and their self titled debut album was produced by Butch Vig, the man responsible for producing Nirvana's "Nevermind" along with albums from Soundgarden and L7.

Overwhelming Colorfast did a great job of gearing the crowd up with their 50 minute set which featured their myriad of sounds. Overwhelming Colorfast mixed them all together to create a sound all their own and they shined. Watch out for these guys. You heard it here first.

Then the magic began.

When Too Much Joy hit the stage the 200+ crowd quickly gave up their seats and filled the floor in front of the band. Tim Quirk, TMJ's lead vocalist, welcomed the excited crowd with, "It's Tuesday night but we don't care because we're in a rock band and we're going to teach you what that means!"

And with that said the band started off on their 21 song barrage of music, mirth and mayhem. Kicking in with "Unbeautiful" from their latest release Mutiny. They played a song from every one of their releases in a seemingly non-structured format. It was a free for all of fun for both the band and the hundreds of frenzied fans who sang and danced the night away.

Performing hits like; "Worse," "Donna Everywhere," "Magic," "Susquehanna Hat Co." and "Starry Eyes", TMJ gave something to everyone in attendance. They even met 2/3 of the challenge presented to them in the preview article by playing, "Kicking (that gone fishin' song)" and the TMJ classic, "Drum Machine."

And even though they didn't play a cover of The Go-Go's, "Vacation", they did do a great "Whisper to a Scream" by Icicle Works so I'll give them the points

Quicksand stays afloat while Antenna drowns

Slip
Quicksand
Polydor

Quicksand is a band ready to carve out a niche for themselves in the college sub-mainstream. Slip, their latest effort is a group of raunchy songs which appeals to that little mosh pit of neurotransmitters we all repress.

These four angry lads rip through their tunes with a controlled abandon, kind of like Fugazi and Helmet's little cousins. They tackle all the classic topics of rage bands — being pissed, confronting the object of one's love/hate and of course, eating by yourself. "Dine Alone" is Slip's hands down winner. Here's a taste, ". . . the couple next to you think you look strange alone what are your aims or do you have any."

Equally invigorating is "Fazer," a lecture of rapid fire melody changes about getting your act together and stopping that needless and time consuming self doubt. ". . . left out in the cold sight routine getting old blame some indifference inside . . . " The message maybe a bit convoluted but I feel strangely motivated.

They are young and unpolished but they do have a target and you know what they're trying to establish. Quicksand could fit right into the whole alternative anger thing.

Hideout
Antenna
Mammoth

I can see it now. Three modestly dressed college kids take the stage. As they take a few seconds to get in tune, a few heads in the crowd turn, a few of those heads approach the stage. "Good

Junkie lifestyles seen in Drugstore Cowboy

By Martin Brown
Collegian Correspondent

"Ya see, most people, they don't know how they're going to feel from one moment to the next, but a dope fiend has a pretty good idea. All they have to do is look at the little bottles." — Bob In Drugstore Cowboy

Video Pick of the Week

Since cannabis reform seems to be the "hot topic" of the week, I thought it might be interesting to do this week's rental of the week on drugs. Not that marijuana and the hard drugs used in this movie have anything in common. Anyway, the name of the movie is Drugstore Cowboy, a film that not only examines a lifestyle, but is not afraid to have a little fun with the serious topic of drugs.

The story takes place in Portland Oregon in 1971, sort of after the fallout of the Summer of Love. It is basically about Bob and his crew (3 others) who steal from drugstores for drugs. They're junkies who need the fix, so they pull small cons in order to get their drugs. I don't want to reveal to much of the story so I'll just leave it by saying they start running into problems after a while.

One of the great things about Drugstore Cowboy is it doesn't take itself too seriously. Most movies about drugs tend to be quite heavy-handed. I suppose in the era of "Just Say No" these movies have the best intentions, but after a while it does tend to get rather cliche. In most of these movies I can figure out what's going to happen before the movie is half over.

Matt Dillon (The Flamingo Kid, Singles) does some of his best work with Bob, the leader of the crew. He handles his scenes with a cool laid-back ease. It helps that he gets great lines like, "Nobody, I mean nobody, can talk a junkie out of using. You can talk to them for years, but sooner or later they're gonna get a hold of something. Maybe it's not dope, maybe it's booze, maybe it's glue, maybe it's gasoline, maybe it's a gunshot in the head, but something, something to relieve the pressures of everyday life like having to tie your shoes." This is the best performance by a younger actor that I can think of.

Director Gus Van Sant (My Own Private Idaho) does a great job with the material also. He's not afraid to have scenes that aren't essential to the story. He can go off on a tangent usually with great results. For instance, when Bob visits his mother in order to get some old clothes or when he explains why mentioning dogs is a "hex".

He also has a distinct flare for backgrounds that are quite beautiful. He has some scenes of the Northwest terrain that really add a stark contrast to some of the events of the movie.

The supporting cast also does an all around good job. Most noticably, Kelly Lynch plays Diane, Bob's wife, with an anger that is quite convincing.

But the most interesting supporting performance has to go to William S. Burroughs of Naked Lunch fame. The man looks like he has been dragged through hell. He plays Thom, a priest who was excommunicated because of his drug problem. Burroughs has had a resurgence lately with the band Ministry (Just One Fix) and his work with Sonic Youth on Dead City Radio. I think this new found attention is because of his performance in Drugstore Cowboy.

So you're going to have a little free time over Spring Break, if you want to see a well-done mature movie about drugs, that entertains and informs, check out Drugstore Cowboy.

Misguided messages plagues Falling Down

By JON LUPO
Collegian Staff

The opening of Falling Down has been largely praised, and justly so. It begins as an extreme close-up on Michael Douglas's lips. They tremble slightly, then become pronounced as his brow sweats — all while he sits in heated, static traffic. As the scene around him festers, Douglas just cracks. He gets out of the car and with only his briefcase, makes his way up the highway embankment. "I'm going home," he says to the stalled drivers.

This is brauva work by both Douglas and slippery director Joel Schumacher, known for helming slick but empty hits such as St. Elmo's Fire, Lost Boys and Flatliners. Falling Down is arguably each of their best works. By no means a masterpiece; at times darkly comic and others downright reprehensible, Falling Down is compulsively watchable — an engrossing revenge fantasy that tries to be a thriller and a comedy and social comment. It's shaky tone, however, forces its message to become mired in its own inability to deal with the questions it brings up. It wants to have its cake and eat it too.

Douglas, with a severe buzz cut and Kevin Costner/JFK glasses, plays a laid off defense worker who rampages across L.A. to Venice to attend his daughter's birthday party. Douglas begins as a sort of Everyman, first terrorizing a Korean shop owner because of his inflated prices. Then he chases away a group of Hispanic gang-bangers, and after a botched drive-by shooting by the gang, he takes their duffel-bag of arsenal and begins an assault on everything that pisses him off.

The other story of Falling Down (and ultimately the more interesting one) involves the last day of a retiring cop (the superb Robert Duvall) and his problems with his wife. Duvall becomes involved in trying to capture Douglas and they don't share the screen until the end, in an electric encounter at the edge of a pier — an old-fashioned shootout with actors at their peak.

At first, Douglas and Schumacher play the early scenes as a social revenge fantasy. But soon, Douglas loses his Everyman against the world aura and becomes very dangerous, placing his estranged wife (Barbara Hershey) and daughter in jeopardy. Both the opening scene and a later sequence in a fast food joint hit the mark. But soon Schumacher's blend of black comedy and drama try to come together. Needless to say, it's like oil and water.

The big problem with Falling Down turns out to be this erratic, irresponsible tone. At the outset, we're meant to identify with Douglas and his frustrations about the world. Fine. But the particularly unsettling scenes involving the gang-bangers and a frightful neo-Nazi (which the audience was more amused by than scared of), show a tone shift that's not fully realized. This isn't fun and games anymore. Especially later, when Douglas becomes a "bad guy" — yet still Schumacher wants to undercut the drama with comedy.

Up until the last frame, Falling Down seems to want to wash its hands of the complex issues and characters and remain a White man revenge fantasy. It just ends up contradicting itself, running around in a dozen directions and then trying to come back to its original themes.

This becomes dangerous, especially with a mass audience used to simple moral stances and clear-cut characters. The success of Falling Down may be for the wrong reasons. Are people just going to see this film to watch a White guy "avenge" the "bad guys," when they all seem to be minorities? On that subject, Schumacher never thinks that these people are trapped in the same situations and social structure that Douglas himself breaks away from.

Not to undervalue Douglas, who is very, very good here. He's been stuck in a rut of terrible performances in inane movies like Shining Through and Basic Instinct. But in Falling Down, Douglas, more than the film itself, seems to handle the its scattershot transitions without having his performance become a collection of overacted set pieces, the kind devised for clips for trailers and awards ceremonies.

Robert Duvall, who hasn't been this fantastic in a while, takes a familiar plotline (a day before retirement. . .) and makes it a quest for his place in the world. His telephone conversations with wife (Tuesday Weld) are as absorbing as anything Douglas does and maybe even better.

Hershey's role as Douglas' wife is indicative of another problem with Falling Down. Her character, like other supporting players, is underdeveloped to the point where the audience is left to fill in the blanks. I'm all for audiences not having every scrap of information handed to them on a silver platter, but Falling Down leaves way to much room to speculate.

Issues like the death of Duvall's daughter and his marriage to Weld are made to seem important but aren't given enough screen time to full flesh them out. Likewise in the Douglas' relationship to his mother and wife. There are nagging questions like where did Douglas go everyday when he told his mother he was going to work even after he was laid off?

To Schumacher's credit, he handles the dual storyline well. As usual, his visuals are seductive and disarming, creating a Los Angeles that looks and feels like a concrete time bomb. There are quite a few recurring visual motifs, none more pronounced than the American flags that linger in the background of a number of shots. This, coupled with Douglas' former job as a defense worker, plays as a telling attack on the Reagan/Bush era

Ease slowly into your week of hedonistic abandon

By SHAWN McDONNELL
Collegian Staff

With an expectant campus just a hop, skip and 72 hours away from Spring Break, the good folks at Student Valley Productions have devised the perfect plan for easing the strain of those final days. On Thursday night in Hampden Theatre, the group will be presenting a parade of rhyme, rhythm, music and mirth guaranteed to soften the transition into a week of hedonistic abandon.

Reprising the most successful acts from last semester's SVP shows, Thursday's "Evening in Hampden" will be evenly divided between the Mission Improv-able improv comedy players and the electronic sounds of Acoustic Panic.

With a current membership of seven undergrads, Mission Improv-able are UMass' resident practitioners of spontaneous entertainment. Feeding off suggestions from their audience, the gang does everything from dramatized mad libs to improvised operas. Their Thursday performance will feature many new games, including directed changes of emotion and the ominously titled "Worse Case Scenario."

Closing out the evening, the "musical project" that is Acoustic Panic will be combining live acoustic and electric guitar work with the latest in electronic production sound. Panic is cutting-edge entertainment which never fails to impress, and one can hardly imagine a better send-off from three months of academia.

The "SVP Evening in Hampden" featuring Mission, Improv-able, and Acoustic Panic will begin at 8 p.m. Thursday night in Hampden Theatre, Southwest, and there is a suggested donation of $3.

Passion Fish is quality cinema

By IAN CANADINE

Passion Fish is the latest dish to be served up by director John Sayles (Matewan, City of Hope), and it is his contribution to the currently thriving genre of "feel good" human relationship movies. The film centers around May-Alice (Mary McDonnell, in her Oscar-nominated performance), a daytime soap opera star who has been paralyzed from the waist down after being hit by a taxi. Feeling bitter and frustrated by the helpless state she has been left

Hit the slopes or the sands this Spring Break

By JOHN LANCASTER BECK
Generation X-Press

The day begins at 11 a.m. as the early risers amongst the twentysomething spring breakers enter the obligitory 7-Eleven across the street from the hotel.

Bleary-eyed, they purchase the hot dogs and beer that alone stand between them and starvation for this entire week of revelry.

By noon they have rallied and have joined the rapidly growing throngs on the sands in front of their hotel.

The day begins amid a sea of vivid colors that alone is outdone only by a Grateful Dead concert.

The sound of the surf gently pounding the shore blends with the Red Hot Chili Peppers, the Spin Doctors and Nirvana as nature and Sony harmonize on the sands. The scent of salt mingles with that of Tropicana.

Welcome to Spring Break '93. This March, tens of thousands of American college students will seek out a change in attitude through a change in latitude.

The ritual pilgrimage is called Spring Break.

Many will head for the warmer climes to bask in the sun, drink absurd quantities of alcohol and chase each other's sun-burned, bathing suit clad bodies across America's beaches.

For the east coast college jet-set, Florida is the spring break mecca. Continually enjoying special status as party hot spots are Panama City, Daytona Beach, Ft. Lauderdale, Ft. Meyers and Key West.

Chris Stevens, a 21-year-old senior at Bowling Green University in northern Ohio, says, "Last year in Daytona the beer flowed like water. There wasn't a day when the temperature wasn't under 90 degrees."

Julie D'Arcy, a 20-year-old junior at Alfred University in Alfred, N.Y., said that she hated Ft. Lauderdale — "Our hotel was right on the strip. There were parties on the beach every night, the sand was white as snow, the ocean was almost 80 degrees, the sunsets were too bright and it was too easy to get into the clubs. I hated it."

NOT.

Many college students think that the Spring Break road trip is the realm of that rarest of creatures, the wealthy undergraduate.

"Not so," according to Wendy Sharper, 20, a sophomore at the State University of New York at Buffalo. She says that "packages for week-long trips that include transportation and beachfront lodging usually run less than $220."

And informal sampling seems to support this.

Out of five packages deals examined, the cheapest was to Panama City Beach for $189 ($109 without round trip transportation). On the other end of the spectrum is Key West for $245 ($189) without round trip transportation).

These prices are taken from five different companies that offer the trips nationwide annually. In all cases, the package prices are based on four people to a room and include round trip accommodations via chartered busses, organized events and complimentary parties, shuttle bus service in and around the area, seven nights of beachfront hotel accommodations, discount coupons for area restaurants and clubs and full-time, on-site staff to answer any questions and deal with the unforeseen.

Campus sales representatives can be found at most universities in the U.S.

While some bask beneath the Florida sun, other spring breakers will seek their R & R in the somewhat harsher climes of snow country.

Dan Arlotto, a 22-year-old Cornell University senior says that "Florida is cool enough, but at Schweitzer (in northern Idaho) I can ski the North Bowl. . . and free fall 20 feet between turns."

Arlotto is part of a growing group of college students that head for the high country during the March Spring Break exodus.

"I've done the Daytona thing," he says, "but once you go to the mountains for break, you become an addict."

While the cost of a snow country Spring Break generally seems to be higher than a Florida one, Notre Dame University senior Todd Flint, age 22, says that is deceptive. "When you go on a skiing trip you get a much higher caliber of service. The two are incomparable." According to Flint this is because "you don't have to buy a lift ticket to sit on the beach."

This season, ski resorts throughout the Rockies have been reporting record snowfalls.

According to Tiom Kirst, a 23-year-old December 1992, graduate of Mercyhurst College in Erie, Pa., "Steamboat Springs has a nightlife that puts Ft. Lauderdale to shame." He claims that "you can't beat Colorado for Spring Break. There is powder up to your waist, and awesome bars for after the slopes."

Out of five ski packages examines, the cheapest was Vail, Colo., for $399 ($309 without round trip transportation). On the other end of the spectrum was Schweitzer, Idaho, for $495 ($399 without round trip transportation). In the middle was Steamboat Springs, Colo., for $459 ($375 without round trip transportation).

These prices are taken from five different companies that offer these trips nationwide annually.

In all cases, the package prices are based on four people to a room and include round trip accommodations via chartered busses, organized events and complimentary parties, shuttle bus service in and around the area, six nights of accommodations at hotels with swimming pools, discount coupons for area restaurants and clubs, five days of skiing and full-time, on-site staff to answer questions and deal with any problems. Campus sales representatives are located at most universities across the country.

"I love being able to get a suntan at the same time I am carving down a mountainside," says 20-year-old Clarion University of Pennsylvania sophomore Mike Tucker.

Whether it's sand or powder, moguls or dunes, Spring Break '93 is nearly upon us. So grab your towel, put on your skis and leave your troubles behind.

The members of Rent Party defy definition

By I.ORI O'CONNOR
Collegian Staff

Local band Rent Party has come a long way since the days when founding members Dave Marrish and Richard Zafft were often commissioned to play at pay-at-the-door-keg-parties for tenants trying to scrape up enough cash to pay their rent. They have been getting major label interest as of late, and have recently become associated with the management of musical success story, The Spin Doctors. It's a welcome change for the band, whose current line up of lead singer Marrish, bassist Zafft, drummer Doug Raneri and guitarist Eric Payne, has been together for two years.

Rent Party is a tough band to categorize musically. Says Raneri, "People label us as a cross between The Spin Doctors, The Chili Peppers and My Bloody Valentine. Our rhythmic stuff borrows from hip hop and Manchester beat, while the guitar stems from rock and roll with funk overtones."

Raneri isn't worried by their lack of a definitive sound. He says, "We've been questioning what the label 'alternative' means nowadays, and wondering just where we fit in. There's a certain sound associated with the valley and bands can get trapped by that stereotype. We want to smash those barriers."

The varied sound of Rent Party can be traced to the members' vastly different musical influences. Marrish grew up on soul and gospel, Zafft on motown and blues, Payne listened to Led Zepplin and Aerosmith and Raneri is a self proclaimed "jazz man." As a result, they've created a modern sound based on these roots.

Says Raneri, "We work together and try to bring in little germs of stuff from our backgrounds. Essentially, what we do on stage is spread our germs."

Their "germs" have given rise to slow ballads like the slinky "Inside You" and the high energy power chord funk jams of "United Nations of Love."

Their outlandish sense of humor lends Rent Party a touch of humanity where other bands might let all the attention go to their heads.

Asked what he wants from the future in terms of the band, Raneri says, "At least a half hour of fame with a minimum of commercial interruption. We want Roseanne Barr to spit on our pitcher's mound."

And what makes them different from other bands? Answers Raneri, "Our sound, and the fact that we have much more experience musically. Also, the entire band has been abducted by space aliens several times. Our lead singer has a space tan to prove it. Scorsese's been trying to get in touch."

They're different. They're quirky. They're up and coming. They're Rent Party, and their show is like a musical bag of Hershey's Miniatures. Amid the eclectic sounds, there's definitely something for everybody.

Come watch Rent Party spread their germs Friday night at The Baystate in Northampton. Showtime is at 10 p.m. and there will be a small cover.

Listen to This! Latest alternative releases

By KEN MAIURI
Collegian Correspondent

Without further ado, here is an overview of this week's brand-new "alternative" releases. I spent too much money, and from the sounds of things, you might be doing the same very soon at a music store near you. Listen to this:

Frank Black
Frank Black
4 A.D./Elektra

The Pixies are dead. For those expecting another Doolittle, you may be disappointed. On the other hand, Frank Black is a cool idea of its own. Most of the squealing dual guitar feedback of the Pixies has been replaced with acoustic guitar and keyboards, but the strangeness and quirky wit of Black Francis is still intact. For instance, from "I Heard Ramona Sing:" "I don't care if they're real or they're pseudo/I don't care if they get any higher/I hope if someone retires/They pull another Menudo."

Each of the 15 songs has a sound of its own, from the farfisa shuffle of "Two Spaces" to the Pixies-ish crunch of "Czar," to the almost a capella "Brackish Boy." The surprising highlight of the album is a kicky instrumental called "Tossed," which includes John Linnell from They Might Be Giants on saxophone. It's the catchiest, most dancable song Black Francis ever wrote—Black Francis, Frank Black, Charles Thompson, whoever. The name is different, but the weirdness is the same. A-

Not In Kansas Anymore
Basehead
Imago Records

Michael Ivey is Basehead. Sort of like a funky, jazzy, woozy Trent Reznor, Ivey plays all the instruments himself; his voice sounds like he just woke up. Whereas on his first album, Play With Toys, he mumbled through lyrics about his favorite beer, his new album finds him mumbling through more serious lyrics about being Black in America.

"Brown Kisses Part One" is a catchy, singsong tune that ends with Ivey yawning "Kiss my Black ass;" "Fluffy and Richard" is a song about Ivey's friend who loves cats. The highlight is probably "Do You Wanna @!#% Or What," which speaks for itself. Unfortunately, Ivey includes a bunch of short "joke things" called "Hoes On Tour" which aren't funny at all. They disrupt the flow of an impressive and cool-sounding album. Try it out anyway. B

Soundtrack to the Film "Breakfast On the Beach of Deception"
Monks of Doom
I.R.S. Records

I.R.S. Records has just reissued the first few Camper Van Beethoven albums, along with the first two by Monks of Doom, one of the two Camper offshoot bands. Filled mostly with instrumentals, the Monks' first disc is surprisingly accessible. The tunes are complex, but not so much that the average listener would be turned off.

"Lappish Tea Song" is beautiful, "Visions from the Acid Couch" has a ton of stuff going on in it, and "B Music" has a melancholy feel. "Fall From Grace" is one of the few vocal songs that works, but overall it's a well-played, interesting disc. B+

Zucker
Fastbacks
Sub Pop Records

Kurt Bloch, lead guitarist for the Fastbacks, is also a member of Young Fresh Fellows, a better band. One of the reasons is probably because the vocal chores for the Fastbacks, who've been around for 15 years, are carried by two female singers, neither of whom is able to stay on key very well. A lot of reviewers have found this charming, but unless you're in the right mood, you'll be more apt to turn it off than turn it up.

Warbling aside there are a few really good songs, like "Gone to the Moon" which is great to sing along to, and "Bill Challenger," a loud Eddie Van Halen/Black Francis sort of instrumental that would sound great as a TV theme song. Grungey and poppy, the Fastbacks may grab some airplay in this age of Nirvana, but they just don't have the songs. C

Pain Makes You Beautiful
Judybats
Sire Records

After two albums of good songs and no media attention, the Judybats of stripped things down and taken away the loud guitars and violin, leaving an acoustic wash of harmonies and subdued drumming. Despite the change in sound, the Judybats' new album is wonderful. Amazingly happy and melancholy at the same time, the disc sounds like it was recorded in an empty, expansive apartment; there is echo seeping over every vocal and instrument, and there is a distinctive ghostly feel to the songs.

"All Day Afternoon" features a beautiful melody from lead vocalist Jeff Heiskell, and "Ugly On the Outside" is a gentle stomp with another catchy melody. Despite the sad feel throughout the album, they're no Cure — the listener stays interested right up until the last song, "Pain." A nice surprise. B+

King Missile whow to lord over Pearl Street

By ADAM GOULSTON
Collegian Correspondent

Truthfully, at any point last summer did you anticipate toddling through downtown Amherst in the middle of winter, humming to yourself a tune about a removable phallus? It's not too likely.

However, the devotees of New York's King Missile probably did not rule out the possibility of this scenario.

Those familiar with King Missile's roughly eleven year history are aware of frontman John S. Hall's propensity for tackling an insanely broad array of subjects. The #1 college radio hit "Detachable Penis" is just one more example of Hall's unlimited scope.

Monday March 22 at Pearl Street you'll get an opportunity to sing (or talk) along with "Detachable Penis" and all your other past and present King Missile favorites. Picking up your tickets before taking off for exotic or not so exotic locale is recommended because with their latest release, Happy Hour, King Missile has gained national attention.

On Happy Hour, the band's fifth album overall, King Missile has built upon their already solid foundation in the college arena.

The current lineup of Hall, guitarist Dave Rick, bassist and keyboardist Chris Xefos and drummer Roger Murdock boast only one member (Hall) tentative original formation back in 1982. While only a duo, King Missile's first release in 1987, Fluting on the Hump displayed a diverse in, she decides to abandon New York and return to her childhood home in backwoods Louisiana.

Here she sinks into a rut of alcoholism and twenty-four hour TV watching, while a succession of nurses she cannot stand pass through her employ. Eventually Chantelle (Alfre Woodard) arrives from the nursing agency, and they become stuck together because undisclosed troubles in her past mean she cannot afford to lose the job.

The film's opening reflects May-Alice's state in its abruptness, with fragmentary scenes of her experiences in accident rehabilitation. Here Sayles captures the sense of her frustration well, through frequent use of subjective camera. May-Alice handles her situation by putting up a screen of bitterness and sardonic wit, which tempers the sentimentality which might otherwise pervade.

As the relationship between May-Alice and Chantelle develops, the claustrophobia of the first section opens out, and we begin to take in the beautiful landscapes and wildlife of Louisiana. Here Sayles' skillfully creates through camerawork a visual contrast between May-Alice's initial frustration and depression and her gradual reawakening. He captures a real sense of the South, which is enhanced by the joie-de-vivre of the Cajun culture which the movie immerses itself in.

Of course, the central element of the film is the relationship between the two women. Chantelle's character is an enigma, and the relationship turns on the gradual revelation of her past, which Alfre Woodard handles well. May-Alice's character contains the essential contradiction of her innocent childhood and the cynical woman she has become, and Mary McDonnell manages to create a skillful balance between the two.

Passion Fish cannot really be faulted on its construction and performance, and it is without a doubt a well-made film. However, its "triumph over adversity" theme is by now well-worn, as is the central relationship, so that the final outcome is predictable from the start. Although the film displays a fine sense of black humor, this does not ultimately rescue it from the tyranny of the happy ending.

Sayles seems to have packed in so many social issues that here is a definite impression of contrived sentiment. The result of this is that you leave the film feeling like you've just indulged in some kind of emotional voyeurism (although, to be fair, all cinema is voyeurism of one sort or another).

If tasteful "quality" cinema is for you, it is a good film on those terms. If you look to cinema to truly disturb or challenge you, however, then you might approach it with a certain amount of suspicion.

and capable group. The album produced two college radio hits in "Take Stuff From Work" and "Sensitive Artist."

They segued into greater musical experimentation which prevailed on 1990's Mystical Shit which yielded the #1 hit "Jesus Was Way Cool," a semi-comic narrative of the real reasons Jesus Christ was so great. The album and singles (also including favorite "Cheesecake Truck") elevated the group to a near cult status.

To no one's surprise, 1991's The Way to Salvation also proved a college radio triumph.

For Happy Hour, Roger Murdock was added after a brief stint as touring drummer. The result is the band's best formation yet, diverse, musical and at times profound. Happy Hour has proved to be not just a college smash but a mainstream one as well. "Detachable Penis" has flooded airwaves (not just college ones) while gaining MTV's support with a hit video.

John S. Hall's spoken word approach is a unique and appealing one which he explores fully on Happy Hour. In addition to "Penis," the album features tracks such as a masochistic tribute to "Martin Scorsese" and a strange and mesmerizing tune simply entitled "Ed."

In Hall's words, "Happy Hour is exactly an hour long. . . kinda happy, definitely an hour."

Opening act Monks of Doom has the credentials to headline a show and draw a sizeable crowd of their own. Touring in support of Forgery, their fifth release, the Monks call upon everyone from Jah Wobble to Richard Thompson as their influences, but their greatest influence at times is blatantly obvious - Camper Van Beethoven.

All four Monks are Camper alumni and reap the benefits of the classic band's creative roots. There is little this band is not capable of as their songs range broad and deep. There are few musical forms the cannot tackle.

Forgery is interesting in that it's the Monks' third release in a year. Their consummate musicianship produces quality tunes at a rapid pace. On Forgery, vocals are not the centerpiece but rather a pleasant accompaniment. The album reexplores the instrumental which allows longer jams and greater freedom for the musicians.

Like another Camper offshoot band, Cracker, the comparisons to the mother group are inevitable but the Monks stand on their own as a true talented unit.

Let's face it, lately the Valley scene has not hosted as many major national artists as it should. King Missile and Monks of Doom are exceptions to this new rule. Take advantage of this opportunity to see a pair of truly talented and prominent alternative bands.

Your complete Spring Break guide to movies

By JON LUPO
Collegian Staff

In addition to sun and surf, Spring Break proves a great time to catch up on all those movies you just didn't get the chance to see. Here's a sampling of previously reviewed films in current release:

Aladdin — Disney's charmer about a boy, a girl and a big, blue genie. If you haven't seen this blockbuster, you're living in a cave and missing one of the best movie experiences around. Funny, musical and grand entertainment, mostly provided by Robin Williams' wild and crazy performance as the genie. Nominated for multiple Academy Awards, Aladdin is Disney's hippest animated musical yet — and it's not just for kids. B+

Amos & Andrew — Pointless social comedy that tries to debunk stereotypes while reveling in them. A mistaken identity farce gone off the deep end, Samuel L. Jackson and Nicholas Cage gets lost in writer/director E. Max Frye's silly and misguided script and inept direction. And the worst part is, it isn't even that funny. Run, don't walk away from this horrendous movie. D

Best of the Best 2 — Didn't see it. But just think: Does anyone remember Best of the Best 1? I know it has something to do with martial arts. I'm sure it's an instant classic and a front runner for next year's Oscars. **?

Groundhog Day — Bill Murray and his acerbic wit carry you through this amusing little comedy. Murray plays a weather man who must relive the same day over and over again until he gets it right. Not the rip-roaring laughs you might expect, but still funny enough to be worth catching. Only when Murray goes soft at the end does Groudhog Day lose its loopy edge. Andie MacDowell is annoying as Murray's too-perfect love interest. B-

Howards End — The crowning achievement for the series of Merchant-Ivory E.M. Forster adaptations (A Room With A View, Maurice) with a wonderful, Oscar-worthy performance by Emma Thompson at its center. A lovely tale of romance, sisters and an almost mystical country estate known as Howards End. Stellar performances by Anthony Hopkins, Helena Bonham Carter and an Oscar nominated turn by Vanessa Redgrave highlight this magnificent film. One of 1992's best. A

Swing Kids — Less goofy than you think. This is a story about friendship and loyalty set in Germany during the rise of Nazi power. A strong lead performance by Robert Sean Leonard holds together this somewhat heavy but ultimately entertaining yarn that contains a few kinetic dance sequences and a nasty, theatrical performance by Kenneth Branagh. In the end, it's fairly pointless, and the themes are too familiar to be groundbreaking. But what the heck, if you've got nothing else to do . . . C+

Untamed Heart — Christian Slater lays off the Jack Nicholson riffs and plays it closer to the James Dean of East of Eden in this sweet but soulless romance. Oscar-nominated for My Cousin Vinny, Marisa Tomei shows she's more than a one-shot wonder as a waitress who falls for the shy Slater. Generous supporting work by Rosie Perez (White Men Can't Jump) makes Untamed Heart a cute date movie, though the end strains credibility. B-

Sommersby — Richard Gere hasn't been this good since Internal Affairs and Jodie Foster is simply luminous in a role that could've easily been a washout. Gere plays Jack Sommersby, a man who returns from the Civil War to a family and a town that doesn't continued and as payback for the military buildup of the 1980s.

Ultimately, it's Schumacher's inability to weave these themes in a cohesive manner than is the most blatant flaw of this film. Douglas' rampage may start out as a cartoon avenger, righting the wrongs in a screwed up world full of jerks, but it ends up as a personal study of madness and how close we all are to submitting to the same pressures to hold down a job, sustain a happy marriage and fulfill the "American dream."

This is pretty heavy stuff and Schumacher isn't up to it as a filmmaker, at least not yet, mainly because he wants to keep it light and entertaining and never fully give into the themes he's trying to explore. You should see Falling Down — for its brilliant performances — but not for its misguided message. C+

sounds fresher, more vital, more compelling. It bypasses your brain and goes straight from ear to spinal chord when Axl declares "They're out to get me, they won't catch me, 'cuz I'm innocent, they won't break me." (Yes, I know I used the clean set of lyrics — this is a newspaper, y'know.)

Or, for better examples, there's the opening chords to the way-overplayed "Welcome to the Jungle" or the distortion at the beginning of "Mr. Brownstone." If riffs like these can't get you moving, you must be a corpse.

In comparison, Use Your Illusion (insert appropriate Roman numeral here) doesn't sound as original. Granted, the weeping lead guitar at the end of "November Rain" is amazing and "14 Years" is pretty damn good as well.

But there's something missing. Maybe it's the way the band uses songs to get back at people they don't particularly like — "Get in the Ring," while pretty funny, comes to mind, as does the oh-so-PC "Back Off Bitch." Maybe it's two cover songs that lend little new interpretation to the originals, such as "Live and Let Die" and "Knockin' on Heaven's Door."

But enough talk already. Go to the show and see for yourself, because love'em or loathe 'em, the only way to really judge them is to see for yourself. Which I encourage you to go and do.

Guns 'N Roses will appear at the Mullins Center with the Brian May Band on Sat., March 13 at 8:30 p.m.

for merit.

Along with all of these great tunes fans were treated to a new Too Much Joy original titled, "Perfect Criminal" and if it's any indication of future recording sessions the next TMJ album should be amazing.

After almost two physically grueling hours of performance and two encores the band finally left the stage, one by one, as members of the audience rose to the stage to take over singing duties of the band's "Too Much Joy Theme Song" which rounds out every show. And somewhere, off in the distance, guitarist Jay Blumenfield slowly brought the song to a close by remote guitarwork.

After the show the band sat dripping in sweat in their dressing room. It turned out that Quirk had been suffering from a severe head cold and he looked extremely drawn. "I just ran out of energy," he said.

This is the best live band you will ever see, trust me. If it's at all possible for you to make it out to see the show tonight at the Pardise in Boston, do it! You can never really have too much joy, but with these guys you can come close.

recognize him because he's such an improvement over the old Jack Sommersby. A rich romantic fable — the kind of film where people do things for love, honor, pride and name that people in movies just don't do anymore. Even the most cynical heart will be melted by this well-acted drama. Though the ending may be a bit too hard to swallow, but Sommersby is worth taking a look at. B+

Mad Dog and Glory — Director John McNaughton (Henry: Portrait of A Serial Killer) and producer Martin Scorsese try to make an oddball comedy with quirky characters, but all they come out with is stilted, stop-and-go humor that more than misses the mark; it dribbles. A great cast that seems to go in circles trying to make something interesting out of this mess. This Dog should be put out of its misery. C-

Army of Darkness — This tepid, losely based sequel to Sam Raimi's cult hit Evil Dead series unfortunately falls flat. The intrepid hero (Bruce Campbell) travels back in time to do battle with the Book of the Dead again in this film heavy on the special effects but low on Raimi's usual brand of imaginative, campy humor. Skip it and revel in Evil Dead or Evil Dead 2 on video. Now that's entertainment. C

Scent of A Woman — Al Pacino plays a gruff blind man who takes one last grand tour of New York City with a prep-school companion (Chris O'Donnell) in this Oscar-nominated film. For the most part, Scent of A Woman is a clever and humorous journey, anchored by Pacino's rich performance and O'Donnell's charm. Then the film turns crassly sentimental and becomes boorishly preachy. The prep-school finale feels tacked-on and it's a sort of intellectual cop-out — it reduces Pacino's complex characterization into maudlin soap opera. Clocking in at nearly three hours, Scent of A Woman begins with promise and unfortunately ends with cheap melodrama. B-

Unforgiven — Clint Eastwood's fine revisionist western is the best bet to sweep the Academy Awards even though Eastwood heads an erratic cast, with Gene Hackman coming out on top and Morgan Freeman and Eastwood himself just portraying variations on characters they've played before. Unforgiven is definitely worth a look for its well-drawn characters (if not performances), beautiful panoramic vistas and a tough but poetic script by David Webb Peoples. I wasn't overwhelmed by Eastwood's vision, but I was definately Intrigued. B+

The Crying Game — If you haven't seen this movie — GO! Irish writer/director Neil Jordan has crafted one of 1991's best, a seductive mystery/romance that's deceptively beautiful and wonderfully original. The superb cast, headed by Stephen Rea, Jaye Davidson, Forest Whitaker and Miranda Richardson are untouchable and the characters they create will surely go down in movie history. Yes, there's a twist, but the big surprise is that The Crying Game is a near-perfect film all about desire, conscience and the question of what love really is. Don't miss it. A

Peter's Friends — Brash British director Kenneth Branagh takes a break from Shakespeare (Henry V) and Hitchcock (Dead Again) to create this very fluffy film about a group of Cambridge students who reunite ten years after their graduation. There are the usual problems: fights, make-ups, big revelations and plenty of talk (and action) about sex. The cast is uniformly excellent and they make the trite material seem a lot more clever than it really is — all except comedienne Rita Rudner (who co-wrote the script) who's way out of her acting league here. Easily forgettable, but also easily enjoyable. B-

Damage — Obsession is the big theme in French director Louis Malle's atmospheric romance about a British politician (Jeremy Irons) who falls — bad — for his son's fiancee (Juliette Binoche) and the consequences of their forbidden desire. Intelligent and thoughtful performances all around, especially Rupert Graves as the betrayed son and Oscar-nominated Miranda Richardson as the betrayed wife. Malle directs the mood as much as the actors here and the story may be too melodramatic for many viewers, but Damage lingers enough in your memory to make an impact. B+

A Few Good Men — This blockbuster, Oscar-nominated courtroom drama excels purely on its intense star power. Tom Cruise tries to bring down top marine brass Jack Nicholson in this wildly entertaining film that's as empty as Melanie Griffith's head and then some. Basically a legal shell game, with the fiery lawyer claptrap taking the place of any real drama. Not that it's missed or anything. With a script as audience-rigged as this one, no one seems to care this is more of an efficient Hollywood product than Oscar-worthy material. They do make 'em like they used to. B+ evening. We are Antenna," and tear into "Fade" a straight ahead rocker off their new release Hideout. Halfway through the song, the club finally kills the background music. After a set worthy of an opening band and little more, a smattering of applause marks the bands departure as they give way to a group better at this kind of stuff. A group like say, Superchunk.

Hideout delivers 12 solid tracks of indie rock, nothing fancy. Similar to Antenna's underwhelming 1991 debut Sway, it lacks focus.

John Strohm's vocal abilities seem limited. In many cases, he makes a song less listenable with his restrained style more reminiscent of that of the seventies and early eighties. He sounds like a middle American Elvis Costello. His voice does hold together tunes like the ambling "Second Skin" but handicaps other songs such as the promising "Rust" with its neat little reference to and sample of John Coltrane.

"Don't Be Late" and "Easy Listening" just wlnd on down some lonesome interstate, passing no landmarks, creating no feeling, going nowhere in particular. But that's okay, it's indie rock and this is the month for it.

Credit is due however for the catchy "Wallpaper" to which Strohm lends what range he is capable of to the nice vocal backdrop and catchy riffs.

The songs are solid but Antenna lacks focus and creative force — attributes virtually indispensable for appealing to the college radio crowd they're shooting for.

Minutemen win A-10 tourney

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

At some point in nearly every University of Massachusetts victory this season, the Minutemen use a defensive surge to not only shut down their opponent's offense, but break their spirit.

The Minutemen pick up their defensive intensity, begin to get a hand in every shooter's face, grab every loose ball and execute perfectly on the offensive end. UMass plays nearly flawlessly as it marches over its opponent.

When the stand is over, the opponent, if not out of the game on the scoreboard, looks beaten and confused.

It was no different last night as the Minutemen (23-6) rode the second-half surge and the hot hand of forward Harper Williams (20 points, 8 rebounds) to defeat the Temple Owls, 69-61, and capture their second straight Atlantic 10 Championship and an automatic bid in the NCAA Tournament.

The surge, this time 6:53 long, boosted No. 20 UMass from a 40-34 deficit to a 48-42 lead it would never relinquish.

"When we get it going defensively things seem to fall into place," said Williams, who for the second consecutive year was named tournament MVP. "We put them on their heels and keep banging and banging. We play so hard the entire game, that we wait for the other team to go down, even just a little bit, and jump on them."

During the UMass run, Temple's Aaron McKie and Eddie Jones, who slashed their way to a combined 21 first-half points, suddenly looked mortal. McKie failed to score a field goal in the second half.

UMass' full court press rattled the Owls, disturbing their offensive flow and forcing one 10-second violation. Meanwhile, Williams was everywhere, pouring in nine points during the stretch while Tony Barbee (11 points) stepped up his play at both ends of the court.

"Tony Barbee won this game for us," UMass coach John Calipari, who collected his 100th career victory, said. "His senior leadership in the second half was the difference. Harper stepped up and scored and rebounded, but Tony was so important out there."

UMass center Lou Roe (10 points, 14 rebounds) said, "We knew if they hung around they could win it, so we had to pull away so they couldn't come back. We had to step up defensively."

Temple, after shooting 44 percent in the first half, was held to 33 percent shooting in the final 20 minutes of play.

The Owls kept the game interesting down the stretch, battling back from as

The names of the four finalists for the chancellorship of the University of Massachusetts were announced Thursday.

The finalists are Diether H. Haenicke of Western Michigan University, Claudia Mitchell-Kernan of the University of California at Los Angeles, Luis Proenza of the University of Alaska and David Scott of the Michigan State University.

Rina Spence, a member of the Board of Trustees, announced the names and said all the finalists have excellent leadership qualities and significant administrative experience in a university environment.

Reno gets the nod in Senate vote

Clinton's AG nomination nightmare comes to a close

By JAMES ROWLEY
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Senate unanimously confirmed Janet Reno on Thursday as the nation's first female attorney general, completing the Clinton Cabinet and bringing fresh leadership to a Justice Department still led by a Bush holdover.

Applause broke out in the normally decorous Senate chamber when the 98-0 vote was announced, making Reno the government's top law enforcement officer.

Problems ranging from a terrorist bombing in New York to questions about the FBI director in her own department await the 54-year-old prosecutor. She is expected to be sworn in next week.

"President Clinton should be commended for taking yet another step in opening new opportunities for women and minorities," Sen. Howard Metzenbaum, D-Ohio, said in the brief discussion that preceded the vote.

Reno's cakewalk through the constitutional advise-and-consent process closed the book on a Clinton Cabinet-selection process that got under way not long after his election last November.

Clinton's difficulties filling the job of attorney general — the failed nomination of Zoe Baird and the withdrawal of federal judge Kimba Wood from consideration — have delayed any major policy reviews at the Justice Department.

"I would submit that President Clinton — albeit not the first time at bat — has hit a home run," said Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del.

The Senate confirmed Reno just a day after the Judiciary Committee approved her nomination. Normally, there must be a three-day waiting period before the full Senate can act, but that was waived.

The agency has been run, since Clinton's Jan. 20 inauguration, by Bush administration appointee Stuart Gerson.

Reno, who will be the first Democrat to head the Justice Department in 12 years, is expected to make many policy changes.

But the standoff between federal agents and an armed religious cult in Texas and the FBI's investigation of the World Trade Center bombing will force her to focus her immediate attention on day-to-day enforcement of the nation's criminal laws.

Lizana and Nuñez sweep SGA elections

By ALYSSA M. OWENS
Collegian Staff

The election of Al Lizana as student trustee and David Nuñez as student government president saw a significantly larger turnout than last year's student government election, and "was probably the largest in four years," Jon Aronson, chair of the Undergraduate Student Senate's Governmental Affairs Committee, said.

Aronson said 3,696 students voted in the election, compared to last year's figure of about 2,100.

Since they would not have affected election results, 613 absentee votes were not counted, he said.

Al Lizana won the student trustee position with 1,878 votes, defeating Jeff Turco (630) and Kevin Jourdain (193).

David Nuñez won the student government presidency with 1,907 votes, defeating Jennifer Fazzi (509).

The new student trustee's term will begin July 1, while the student government president will be sworn in April 1.

Voters also passed the two referendums on the ballot. The UMass Cannabis Reform Coalition's hemp initiative, a nonbinding referendum to legalize marijuana on campus, was supported by two-thirds of the voters, and students approved sending the SGA constitution before the Board of Trustees by a three-fourths vote.

Current Student Trustee Kevin Newnan said the SGA constitution, now passed by the student body, will be reviewed by Chancellor Richard O'Brien and President Michael Hooker before being sent to the Board of Trustees for final approval, possibly in June.

Investigators find shooting of doctor not a conspiracy

By GARRY MITCHELL
Associated Press

PENSACOLA, FLA. — Investigators found no evidence Thursday of a conspiracy in the shooting death of a doctor outside his abortion clinic. The anti-abortion demonstrator who reportedly confessed was ordered held without bond.

In the wake of what is believed to be the nation's first killing stemming from an abortion demonstration, clinics around the country tightened security and women's groups urged Congress to approve legislation making the blocking of clinics a federal crime.

At conservative Pensacola's two abortion clinics, police increased security.

"The whole community feels violated by the killing," Mayor Jerry Maygarden said.

A candlelight vigil in Gunn's memory was planned in Pensacola for Thursday night.

Michael Frederick Griffin, once described by his wife as suffering "great fits of violence," was ordered held without bond. A day earlier, he shot Dr. David Gunn, calmly surrendered and confessed, authorities said.

"At this time we have no evidence to indicate a conspiracy exists," police Sgt. Jerry Potts said. "The case is not closed, but I can't say we anticipate additional arrests."

In Washington, several national groups urged an FBI investigation of "anti-choice violence."

The shooting, abortion rights advocates said, is indicative of growing ex-

Cigarette ashes spark JQA fire

False alarms lead residents to false sense of security

By LAVONETTE LUCIANO
Collegian Correspondent

After a series of false alarms over the past month, residents of John Quincy Adams residence hall were caught by surprise by a real fire Wednesday night.

The fire apparently started around 8:15 p.m. when students smoking in the third floor lounge dropped their ashes into a trash can, and the ashes smoldered into flames.

"The fire was confined to a trash barrel," said David Beaudin, a fire prevention officer for Environmental Health and Safety. "There was a good bit of smoke, but no real damage."

Third floor resident Anne Crowell recalled entering the lounge. "It was full of thick smoke. My eyes started watering," she said.

Residents say they are outraged by the excessive number of false alarms in the building. One third-floor resident remained in her room during the alarm.

"Educate people. Whether you think it's false or real you need to get out anyway," said Khaleelah Abdul-Kareem, residence director for JQA.

Fire and safety officer Mike Swain held an emergency floor meeting with residents later that night.

Swain, one of the first to arrive on the scene, said, "If the fire had kept burning they would have never been able to get out."

A petition in JQA was circulated among residents regarding the false alarms and the installment of a warning alarm. According to Beaudin, the warning alarm would sound before an actual building alarm is activated.

Presently installed in Coolidge, the warning alarm system is intended to decrease the frequency of false alarms. The building alarm, distinctive from the warning alarm, will be activated after the warning if a fire actually exists.

Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Tom Robinson outlines his agenda.

Stopping violence is one of the most important issues on campus, according to Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Tom Robinson. This past weekend saw nine altercations at the University, some of which are alleged to be racially motivated, and Robinson said these events were not unusual for the University.

"We must address violence problems on campus," Robinson said. "To deal with this we must put in place lines of communication and put efforts into working with special communities and populations."

Robinson spoke yesterday about problems facing the University to a group of about 60 people, including University staff, faculty and administrators, about campus concerns at a forum in the Campus Center.

He said he wants UMass to work at being a multicultural University and deal fundamentally with negative cultural issues.

"We must work on acceptance of other people," Robinson said. "The University doesn't really value people, so the UMass way of dealing with people gets extrapolated as discriminatory."

The racial events that took place in the residence halls last fall prompted Robinson to take a look at Housing Services.

Robinson appointed a committee to review the position of resident assistant, and established a Housing Services

Women work for change

Society blocks Asian women's progress

By THERESE COLLINS
Collegian Correspondent

The Japanese women's movement is beginning to take form despite governmental and social oppression, said three Japanese scholars Sunday in the Campus Center.

The forum, titled, "Women in Japan in the Context of Asia: A Socio-Cultural Perspective," addressed the obstacles facing women seeking change.

Professor Haruko Takeda, of Ritsumeikan University, Japan, said she hoped to use the forum as a "springboard for action." Recounting her own "guerilla actions" against the system, she urged them to take action.

Takeda said Japan's family registry, the official record of names and lineage, is an agent of discrimination and suppression, and must be eradicated. Married couples are listed under one name. In the past, the man's name was usually chosen, but now women are not allowed to use their maiden names. Women are only known as their husbands' wives.

Takeda refused to change her maiden name in the registry. As a result, her marriage is considered invalid and her 9-month-old child illegitimate. The label of invalidity translates into higher taxes and ostracization by society.

Chieko Yamazaki, a UMass graduate student in the school of education, followed Takeda with an emotional account of rape and sexual exploitation of women in Asia.

While Korea was torn by war in the mid-1900s, Yamazaki said, Korean women were tricked into coming to Japan, where they were forced to work as sex slaves, called Ianfu, for Japanese soldiers. In 1991, she said, the Japanese government was still reluctant to apologize to the aging women.

A similar sex industry continues today, Yamazaki said. Poverty-stricken East Asian women are tricked into coming to Japan, and then coerced into working in brothels hidden under the cover of "legitimate" clubs and bars, she said. The government insists they are run by private agencies and therefore the government has no jurisdiction over them.

Presenting photographs of Ianfu, Yamazaki said, "We have to remember that human beings can't do these things."

Kuniko Izumi then addressed the relationship between economy and sexuality. She said the female identity in Japan is a product of a sexist and patriarchal image of women. The fragile dependent female is still considered more appealing to men, and this view is accepted by both men and women.

Izumi, a professor at Chiba University in Japan, stressed an immediate need for a women's movement. She cited a poll in which 73 percent of Japanese women said they feel they are not treated equally, yet 70 percent feel there is no need for a women's movement. In 1976, women were paid 56 percent of men's wages; in 1988 this dropped to 50 percent.

Trustee says UM system will grow with unified rules

By MICHAEL R. LINSKEY
Collegian Staff

A trustee of the five-campus University of Massachusetts system told the Faculty Senate yesterday that "university- wide rules" should be implemented so the schools can be run more efficiently and effectively.

Speaking before 56 senators, Trustee John William Poduska, Jr., chairman of the Committee on Academic and Student Affairs, said he is committed to helping the university system grow and prosper.

"This university system here doesn't burn forests or pollute rivers," he said. "It tries to make people think. The [University] President [Michael Hooker] is committed to having us recognize that we can be a predominantly excellent university system."

Poduska, 55, said the Committee on Academic and Student Affairs has an ambitious job to do.

"The committee is quite new; we've only had a few things we've done so far," he said. "On the other hand, it is our job to look over the horizon a little bit, to look at what kind of university this five-college system can be."

Poduska said he supports Hooker's improvement proposals.

"He wants us to have a university system that we would compare favorably to systems like the University of Michigan or the University of California," he said. "All are united in saying that graduates from those schools are at the top of the resource fields for a new educated work force."

Poduska said the university system must establish a uniform set of rules and "chain of command."

"[The committee is] particularly interested in helping the president implement his plan to level the rules from campus to campus," he said. "But our intent is to make the transition from campus to campus as easy, as simple, as direct as we can. And that will probably mean some university-wide rules put in place."

Murray Eisenberg, professor of math and statistics, asked why a system of unified rules was so important, saying the goal of such a proposal was "administrative convenience, not need."

Poduska acknowledged Eisenberg's fear that the trustees would "go too far in one area and not far enough in another," but said, "There are a great many areas where unevenness is an administrative nightmare."

Poduska said CASA has been charged with implementing a six-part "culture" across the university system to help carry the University of Massachusetts to the forefront of university systems.

"There's something that lies inside of all of us that says we know we can do it," he said. "We know that we can be a tier-one university system by the year 2000."

CRC declares symbolic victory, future plans

University of Massachusetts students celebrated the "legalization" of marijuana here on campus at a rally yesterday on the Student Union steps.

During the campus-wide elections Tuesday and Wednesday, 1,977 students voted for the Cannabis Reform Coalition's initiative and 983 voted against it. Approximately 150 students turned out for the victory rally.

The initiative stated that since recreational use of cannabis is "less harmful" than either alcohol or tobacco, and cannabis is "an environmentally beneficial crop," the undergraduate student body at UMass resolves that all laws and statutes prohibiting the cultivation, sale, distribution and use of cannabis are null and void.

Amherst resident Terry Franklin, the first speaker at the rally, encouraged the idea of challenging the "status quo." He also stressed the importance of people getting out and voting.

"This is a great victory," Franklin said. "But it is only a small part of what needs to be done."

tremism in the anti-abortion movement.

"The government needs to ensure that vigilantes, terrorists and religious extremists do not take away our basic right to choose," said Kate Michelman, president of the National Abortion Rights Action League.

Randall Terry, a leader of the anti-abortion group Operation Rescue, called the killing an "inappropriate, repulsive act," but he also called Gunn a murderer of babies.

Griffin, 31, was charged with murder. He is accused of firing three shots at Gunn from a .38-caliber revolver at point-blank range.

Gunn, 47, was getting out of his car at the back door of the Pensacola Women's Medical Services as anti-abortion demonstrators picketed the clinic.

Via a television hookup between the jail and the Escambia County Courthouse, Griffin asked Judge William J. Green for a blanket and a Bible for his cell.

"I would like to keep my Bible as one of my legal documents," Griffin said. Green referred him to jail administrators, who wouldn't comment on the requests.

Izumi displayed two ads used prominently in Japanese AIDS awareness campaigns. The first depicted a middle-class, smiling man covering half his face with a passport. In the corner is printed, "Have a safe trip and be careful about AIDS." The information is directed only at men, said Izumi, with the assumption that only men are in danger of contracting the disease. Izumi asked, "Can you see a Japanese housewife waving goodbye to her husband yelling, '. . . and be careful with AIDS!'"

The second pictured a slender, nude woman underneath an erect condom reading, "Thin but strong enough for AIDS." The erect condom covering the body, Izumi said, can be seen as the penis dueling with the woman and the delicate woman suggests the fragility and weakness of women while emphasizing sensuality. In other words, she said, the ad is saying, "Be sure to control your woman or you may get hurt."

"Economic exploitation and sex exploitation meet at a vertex," she concluded.

In the panel review that followed, Eleanor Mclaughlin, a research associate for the Five-College Women's Studies Center, suggested that the mechanisms of social change may be very different in Asia than in the West. She asked, "Does modernization involve increasing commoditization of women?"

Izumi and Yamazaki said Western style of modernization makes all people slaves of the economic power structure, but even traditional Confucian culture is oppressive.

When asked about the speakers' reactions to the West as women, Izumi said she must reconstruct feminine identity to fit the Western structure. Yamazaki, married to a Westerner, said, "I am an oppressor when I go back to my country."

Yamazaki closed the discussion, saying, "To raise the next generation, we have hope."

"I'll try my best to pick up where Kevin [Newnan] left off and address some of the service reforms," Lizana said. "I want to see what the latest sentiments are of the Board of Trustees on the Legal Services Center."

The Legal Services Center is currently trying to regain its litigation rights.

Lizana said he wants to meet with Robinson to discuss reforms in University Housing Services, University Health Services and food services.

"I feel excited," said Student Government President-elect Nuñez, who said his first step will be to get more people informed about student government.

"I'd like to thank my campaign managers and 70 campaign staff workers and all the people who helped run the election," Nuñez said. "They all worked very hard."

Nuñez's plans for spring break: "I'm going to go home and relax," he said.

Editorial/Opinion

The opinions expressed on this page are those of the individual writers or cartoonists and do not necessarily reflect those of the Collegian unless otherwise noted.

Winter leaves campus, but season of violence continues

It has been a long, cold, difficult winter, and it seems that it is not over yet. The current storm of interracial brutality and unrest is unseasonable and unwelcome. It has been nearly a year since the Rodney King beating and the bitter hatred surrounding it, yet the season of violence is reluctant to let go.

At a time when feelings of anguish and resentment should start to thaw, a time when new growth should begin to sprout from under the melting ice and snow, another storm arrives to bury us. We will be forced to dig out again.

Why, after the justified outrage over the unspeakable torture suffered by Rodney King, after cities were set ablaze, after the most basic rights of human beings were discarded, and the outcome witnessed, was the lesson not learned? Are the emotions, the anger, the hatred so easily forgotten? Are we not hungry enough for the season of mutual respect to begin?

The cold clouds are lingering over our campus again, as the nation begins to search for answers here. It will be difficult for the University to begin to thaw this time because these watchful clouds will not allow a ray of sunshine to penetrate and touch the ground. They will cover us like a blanket, holding in the cold. Any stray flurry to fall will be transformed into a mighty blizzard, signaling a trend in the climate here, a cold and harsh climate.

Jeff
MCKENZIE

It is disheartening to be beaten back into winter while standing at spring's green doorstep. The purpose of those violent young men, I'm sure, was not to halt the changing of the seasons. They were no lovers of winter, either. Whether they were venting anger, or were drunk, even if the issue of race never entered their minds as they rolled through campus beating anyone who got in their way, they are the ones leading us back into the cold. Another cry of racial unrest will go up, and we, all of us — regardless of what color, what origin, what gender — we will be forced to answer for their actions.

It will be the rest of us who longed for the renewing warmth, the rest of us who threw open our windows and our doors in anticipation of the first spring breezes, who must endure the now extended winter.

I don't believe those violent young men wanted this. I don't believe they were indifferent to racial unrest or just didn't care. Their attacks may have been racial in nature, in the sense that they were Black and there were Whites around on which to focus their violence. But they did not intend, in my opinion, to create a symbol of intolerance, of Black versus White, of a need for further racial violence. I do believe they didn't think. They did not think about the consequences for themselves. They did not think about the consequences for this university. They did not think even about the consequences for the entire country.

We will be asked why. We will be asked how. We will be forced to reply to difficult questions, questions that have no answer. We will be seen in a light that is unfriendly and harsh. People will wonder why this small college town in western Massachusetts is different than any other. We will be forced to answer them. The clouds will linger over us.

The cold season will continue here, even as the air softens and the sidewalks become wet. The nation will linger over us and watch, and whereas we once had the chance to lead the way into the season of change and of growth, we now may lead only into a season that should have passed.

Assaults raise questions

A shocking and very frightening event occurred last Friday night. A man was walking down the stairs, minding his own business, when he was assaulted by four men of a different color. The man happened to be holding an ice cream sundae, and unless the four assailants wanted some ice cream, the only other motive appears to be race.

Why wasn't there a "Rally to Protest Racism" on the Student Union steps, you ask? Why wasn't there a denouncement of this act? Why weren't there any brand new signs that "We will not tolerate racism?" The victim happened to be White.

Michael
MORRISSEY

Jason Nietupski is a sophomore ROTC student at UMass whose only crime was an awful knack of being in the wrong place at the wrong time.

He shares this trait with three other White individuals who happened to be assaulted by Black men matching the same description: black hoods, black boots, one over 6-foot-2, at least one carrying a cane.

The men in Butterfield are so terrified of the backlash that they have moved out of the dorms. The man who was beaten up on the Central hill, and had his bike stolen, also refused to give his name to the press.

These victims feel they will be even more victimized if they make their names public. Jason Nietupski was the only one who gave his name, and the perpetrators may decide to come after him again.

There was no rally because if the violence is Black on White at UMass, people are too scared to speak up. There was no denouncement by the administration for the same reason. With "racial tensions" the way they are on campus, many Whites are fearful of speaking up because the administration will call them racist.

Don't laugh, it's true. Crazier things have happened. The truth is, people of every race (White, Black, red, brown, green) do stupid things from time to time, and we shouldn't be afraid to point it out.

Jason tried to call Richard O'Brien to tell him about the incident, but he was transferred to Dean of Students Joanne Vanin, who transferred him to Paul Vasconcellos.

His RA said, "I know you're the type of person who won't make a big deal out of this."

Yes, and even Health Services got into the act, making Jason wait for five hours before he was waited on. Keep in mind, he had a concussion and broken teeth, yet people who had alcohol poisoning and came after him were served first.

Some may say, rewind, Mike, you can't be sure it was racial. Maybe you're right, but since they didn't take his wallet, or anyone else's, the only other motive is that the gang did it for fun.

Some people told me about a game called "Knockdown" where you walk up to someone for no reason and try to knock him down with one punch. If you don't, they beat you up or they beat the unlucky individual up. This is a city game that people play to kill a boring weekend night.

To protect yourself, two things you can do is never walk alone again on the campus. I know I sure won't.

Have a good break. Jason Nietupski probably won't.

In reference to your "interview" titled, "Is LSD misunderstood?" [Collegian, March 6]: I have never seen such a ridiculous, infuriating attempt to thwart and confuse a serious issue. I'm not talking about LSD. I'm talking about the "vote for hemp" letter conveniently crammed into the corner, dwarfed by David Massey's (fictitious?) column interviewing the president of the UMass LSD Coalition.

Is this for real? It does little more than portray the issue of drugs as a topic for brain-damaged dropouts of society. Seeing as society views all drugs in the same light (except legal ones), this column doesn't really make the hemp letter look too good, now does it? Was this deliberate?

Lance Brown, president of the UMass Cannabis Reform Coalition, states that people are often misled by the "powers that be." This column is an obvious example of the ignorance that keeps people from the truth. David Massey's column belongs not on the editorial page, but on the comic page next to "The Adventures of Fred."

Anyone with a clue about the effects of LSD or any drug could tell it was a blatant attack on the CRC. Although Massey hasn't fooled the minority, it's a shame that the misinformed masses must be subject to this abundance of biased opinion. This is where misinformation comes from.

All of this is just more proof not to believe everything you read. Check your sources. We think Massey should be dosed. Maybe it would improve his imagination.

Steinem halts feminist lovolution

When Gloria Steinem was at Smith College last week, her reactions to several of the questioners made me suspicious of her dedication to the feminist revolution.

I informed her I had written her a letter about certain points in her book where she contradicted herself about the private ownership of land. Since she never wrote me back, I wondered if she had received it along with my Feminista, "The Natural Sovereignty of Womankind." Who could I turn to for support when the scholars whom I felt I had something profoundly in common with would not communicate with me?

She then asked if my Feminista was saying women should rule. I answered, "Absolutely. The wise women, the croned are the ones responsible for birthing into existence a new reality." She said she didn't believe women had the natural sovereignty because women and men needed to work together.

After the audience stopped clapping in support of Gloria's putdown of my ideas, which she had not had time to fully comprehend, I said the natural sovereignty of women is due to their final word of yes or no to the sex act. When Gloria said she didn't believe they had the final word I replied, "If they don't have the final word then there is rape, which is the reason we live in a debauched world."

Then Gloria asked me to give her another copy of my Feminista. As of now, I have not received a letter with her thoughts on the feminist lovolution I have envisioned. When will women stop competing with each other so we can begin to live in a world built from the poetic forces of love?

WOCH changes were necessary

I do not want to start an editorial war, but I feel compelled to respond to Nathan Crick's column [Collegian, March 11]. As a member of the WOCH managing staff, I have worked closely with HSCN administrators, as well as with the Orchard Hill/Central Area coordinator. While I cannot say I am pleased with the changes that had to occur regarding WOCH this semester, I must stress that they have come about solely for the protection of the station, the managing staff and our disc jockeys.

Housing officials are not trying to be fascist, Big Brother types; they have advised that the changes are necessary because we are subject to Massachusetts tax payers, as well as accountable to every member of our possible listening audience. Our studio is in a room that is paid for (i.e. heating, electricity) by tax money. Our signal had the capability to go into every housing unit on campus including University Apartments, where children may live. If a parent or any listener takes offense to some broadcast material, that person could feasibly sue WOCH because some of his/her tax dollars go to the station.

A New York university was recently fined $23,750 for broadcasting inappropriate material in the afternoon. While our financial situation has been improving, WOCH could not handle a similar sanction. It would be nice to have a totally uncensored station, but circumstances surrounding the station's removal necessitate some regulation. It is not to anyone's benefit, and is in fact a detriment, to have broadcast graphic descriptions of masturbation at 1 p.m. In addition, it violates federal obscenity laws.

Housing officials, I have to say, have been more helpful and enthusiastic toward WOCH than at any time in the past. Once again, I must emphasize no one is happy about the new policies, but if WOCH is to stay on the air and gain any credibility, they are necessary annoyances.

"They are big, they are powerful and they also have very small brains!" Franklin said.

"Our public servants act like royalty," added Steven Levine, a member of the Libertarian Party.

Although the hemp initiative was passed, the question was not binding. CRC leaders say they are now armed with enough support to propose changes in the judicial policies on campus.

"What we want is a real jury of peers when it comes to a hearing. Punishment should be the same as that of an underaged drinker," said Lance Brown, president of the CRC.

According to Brown, the organization's goal is now to try to change the minds of the people who are against legalization by distributing as much information as possible.

"We plan to create pro-legalization groups at other colleges," Brown said.

Undercover police officers also attended the rally, to ensure safety and to prohibit anyone from smoking the drug openly.

Bo Majkut, a senior political science major, said he voted "yes" for the hemp initiative.

"Why not? It's about time!" Majkut said.

Founder and former president of the coalition Kai Price made the closing remarks, reminding the audience that although UMass had voted for legalization, police would continue to enforce state and federal laws prohibiting the use of drug.

Court backs DMH rules

By EVE EPSTEIN
Associated Press

BOSTON — The state's highest court dealt a blow to those fighting the state's policies towards the mentally ill today, ruling in favor of the Department of Mental Health.

Advocates for the mentally ill had challenged DMH's policies on several grounds, particularly in regard to patient discharges. They said the state's policies violated the Americans with Disabilities Act, and charged the state with negligent discharge of patients.

With the ruling, Stephen Olesky, an attorney who represented one of the plaintiffs in the lawsuit, said the Supreme Judicial Court essentially cut off legal avenues for future challenges.

"They seem to be saying that any relief is going to have to come from legislature," Olesky said.

A lower court judge denied several claims against the state, and the Supreme Judicial Court agreed in an even broader decision, ordering judgement in favor of the state on all claims.

The decision comes at a time when the state has been closing mental health hospitals, leading to allegations by advocates for the homeless that people from the mental health system are being referred to homeless shelters.

The lawsuit was filed by Albert Williams, a man who has been diagnosed as schizophrenic who was discharged from the Massachusetts Mental Health Community Mental Health Center on Nov. 9, 1989. Joseph Kornegay, who was allowed to intervene in the case, became homeless after inpatient treatment at a DMH facility. He has been diagnosed as having a major depressive disorder

Review Commission to see if Housing is serving students as well as possible.

"There are no quick fixes," Robinson said. "We need to constantly look ahead to serve the needs of students in the long run and not resist change."

Robinson also addressed problems with the Student Activities Office, which he is currently reviewing.

He is working on developing the relationships on campus, as well as the problem with the Student Activities' Trust Fund.

Salaries for staff in SAO are no longer paid out of the Trust Fund, which Robinson said has decreased the student activities fee by $33.

Robinson said this means that the SAO staff no longer has a vested interest in the fund, thereby improving relations between the students and the staff.

Robinson said he is also interested in helping the Student Government Association become stronger, and is looking for a new director for student activities.

"To improve the University, we must ultimately have communication," Robinson said. "I operate with an open door policy. I am completely serious about inviting people to visit and taking phone calls."

After speaking on these issues, Robinson opened the floor to the audience, composed of representatives from Health Services, Legal Services, Housing Services and other University groups.

Residential Director Cheryl L. Dukes wanted to know how Robinson would deal with breaking down bureaucratic barriers to increase the flow of information.

"Information is power at the University, and whoever has information has power," Dukes said. "How do you break this and how do you get information?"

According to Robinson, first the University's organizations have to develop a function formally and then develop an informal flow of communication and information.

Robinson said people at the University do not always have to go through the hierarchy to get information, but should go right to those directly involved.

"We must cut through the monumental bureaucracy," Robinson said. "I'm trying to get around campus and hear people to communicate with as many as possible. This demonstrates sharing information, so hopefully people will follow this example."

According to Southwest Residential Director Khaleelah Abdul-Kareem, campus organizations need to work as a team and services should be coordinated with all departments. She said everyone must share the same philosophy.

Robinson is also working on a review of University Health Services, making campus services more accessible and a serious attempt at listening to students. Robinson said students who feel they are not being heard are one of the reasons the University has so many problems.

"I'm really impressed with the way Tom has listened and responded," Carol Wallace, a representative of the Everywoman's Center, said. "It has really made me feel hopeful."

A marvelous break at home

Next week, when most of you sorry bastards are risking skin cancer while basking in the sun of some far-off tropical paradise, I'll be sitting pretty in beautiful downtown Marlboro, Mass., keeping myself busy by quietly getting smashed on the hidden bottle of V.O. that mom keeps for when she's feeling "frisky."

God, it's going to suck.

For the past month now all's I've been hearing about are car rentals, plane tickets, Tan-o-rama, losing weight, traveling music, spending money, contraceptives and fake IDs. So I'm glad that you're all leaving. There are children starving in India and all's you can do is worry about drinking beer and having sex with some beautiful person on a deserted, moonlit beach?

I weep for this country.

The only thing worse than listening to all of this selfishness would be having the night editors here tie me up and force feed me Adam Scott Roberts' fashion columns. And I think you all know just how horrible that would be.

Cutter
GARCIA

So to strike back at you travel-goers the editors here at the Collegian have decided to let me publish a list of the really cool things I'll be doing next week while most of you are busy being self-important.

So while you're reading this in the plane (anybody seen Alive recently? Heh, heh, heh.) or the bus (Yeah! There's a fun trip — 24 hours in a cramped coffin with people who smell like [expletive!]) or the car (Ooh! Can I have the middle seat please? Next to the annoying idiot who refuses to sit through a single song without changing the station? Thanks!) think about what you're missing.

The, Cool Things Cutter Will Be Doing In Marlboro While You Selfish Fools Are Far Away In Paradise list:

1. Listening to the scanner. This one kills me. I get a big bottle of Tab cola and a fresh box of Nilla Wafers and then I just plant myself down in front of the big Bear-Cat 64 where I wait for all the action.

Hell, I've been known to sit there a good 10 or 12 hours straight just waiting for that big call to come in from Marlboro's finest.

And when it does come — I'm out of there, buddy! It's more than worth the wait because sometimes, if you're really lucky, you might get one of those medical assistance calls where a diabetic is freaking out because he ate a whole bowl of Sugar Smacks and then you can race down there and pick up whatever change the poor guy had in his pockets before he went into convulsions and was dragged away. It's pretty cool.

2. Hang out with my "go-nowhere" friends. This is fun because it gives me the opportunity to see just how close I am to becoming a pitiful nothing. We'll all sit around in the finished basement of somebody's parent's Tudor and talk about how cool it's going to be when we're rich and famous.

The fact that this is the same conversation that we've been having for the past 12 years or so, yet is never getting any closer or possible since most of us are either a.) employed at Denny's, or b.) soon will be employed at Denny's, will be completely oblivious to us. So we'll just keep on drinking our Black Label beers while watching Rhonda Shear on USA's "Up All Night."

Ignorance is bliss.

3. Work at my job as a host at The Ground Round. That's right, losers! You'll be hip-high in decadence and debauchery and I'll be up to my neck in snotty-nosed little kids who either want Bingo the clown's autograph or to punch me in the groin! Jealous? Yeah, I'll bet.

There's nothing quite as much fun as listening to some angry mother accuse you of conspiracy when it's penny-a-pound day and the scale tells you that her kid weighs 58 pounds and she damned well knows that the kid weighs 53!

Here's a nickel, you hag, go buy yourself a yacht.

4. Arguing with Mom. This is an art form. It's actually more of a skill than anything. How cool is it to be trapped like a rat in a sinking cage with the woman who has nurtured and protected you? The very same woman who loves to remind you that she has "seen you naked many times and it's no big deal, Mr. Proud and Mighty!" after you scream at her for walking into the bathroom without knocking? It's not very pretty, God bless her.

My sisters and I actually have a pool running where we bet how long it'll be before mom hints

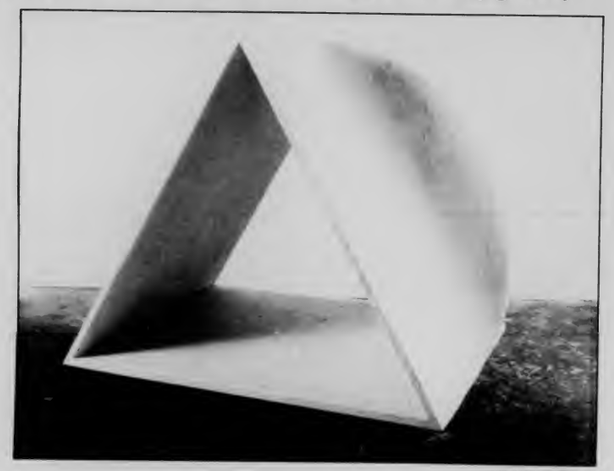
Sculptor Erik Levine redefines the laws of gravity



COURTESY DIANE BROWN

Erik Levine's Untitled (1989).

By LISA CURTIS
Collegian Staff

Life size, milk-toned sculptures stand poised on the very smallest of curves, as if they were balanced on the ball of a foot. None of these pieces are what they initially seem to be — each one is a fusion of simple shapes and forms. Each sculpture is a visual contradiction. This is the art work of Erik Levine.

Insights: Erik Levine will be shown from now until May 30 at the Worcester Art Museum in Worcester, Mass.

This is Levine's first solo museum exhibition in the United States, though he is currently the subject of two one-man shows in Munich, Germany and has recently exhibited in Paris and Vassiviere en Limousin, France.

Levine's work is streamlined, stable and subtle. His work is admired for its sensuality. Each piece has large, sloping curves that create interesting contrasts with its linear elements.

Levine, 32, melds simple geometric shapes such as circles, cones and cubes to create intriguing abstract sculpture. Each piece stretches and captivates the imagination. Levine's forms suggest familiar things — furniture, architecture, mechanical objects, even the human body, which makes them especially startling upon a closer look.

Levine's skill at playing with balance — his challenge of the laws of gravity — has been attributed to the artist's early training as a dancer. Works such as Wheel Box (1988) and Untitled (Cone with Semicircle) (1990) may be said to mimic the dancer's ability to maintain poise while striking a precarious posture.

The powerful formal and spatial identity of his objects depend heavily on mathematical proportions and calculations approximating those of engineering. The simple material he selects and the craft of his technique are reminiscent of carpentry. Levine molds his pieces with furniture-grade plywood and does nothing to disguise the remnants of glue drips, staples, wood putty and pencil marks used to hold the works together. This evidence of the artist's working process endows each sculpture with a kind of textured skin.

The artist himself smiled sporadically and struck a humble pose off to one side of the room as the reporters milled around his sculptures during the exhibit's opening. When I asked him for a word that best fits what the sculptures mean for him, he merely said "paradox." And surely that one word is enough to describe some of the most cerebrally gratifying sculpture currently on exhibit today.

The best video bets for break

By JON LUPO
Collegian Staff

This coming week, many of you will be speeding off to some exotic locale to drench yourself in sun or snow. The other half will be speeding back to their hometown to visit with their parents and spend a week catching up on all that reading you need to do (yeah, right).

One of the destinations you'll probably visit is the local video store. Check out my picks for the perfect flicks to catch when you've got limited coinage and plenty of time to kill. If you've seen them all, see them again — any great movie is worth a second or third look.

1. The Godfather trilogy — If you've got, say, about nine and a half hours to play with, rent the three Godfather films or try to find The Godfather Saga, which is parts one and two edited together in chronological order with some new footage. Or, if you really want the whole package, rent The Godfather Epic Saga, which is all three installments edited together with a substantial amount of new footage.

Either way you choose to view them, The Godfather films are, by themselves, a pure American art form. Rich with history, complex characters and themes, each film is an exhaustive portrait of an American family. The first Godfather is a complete story, yet it truly serves as an introductory canvas for director Francis Ford Coppola's increasingly intricate plots. Marlon Brando makes film history as the aging Don Vito Corleone and a then unkown Al Pacino begins his long wrestle with the role of his lifetime: the heir-apparent, Michael Corleone.

Part Two has a dual structure that focuses on the early life and rise to power of Vito Corleone (here played by Robert DeNiro) and Michael's struggles to maintain his power as the new Don. A very complex plot but nonetheless satisfying and exceedingly well made.

The much maligned but still underrated Part Three is a grand resolution to the series, filled with allusions to Coppola's life and Shakespeare's King Lear. The film looks and feels rushed, and relies a bit too much on the other films and sources for its dramatic themes, but Part Three is still quite mesmerizing.

If you're the least bit serious about film and film history or just want to see a great American saga, The Godfather trilogy is definitely worth a long, lasting look.

2. North by Northwest — Alfred Hitchcock will whiz you across the country in this fast-paced, thrilling adventure about a suave ad man (the always suave Cary Grant) who is mistaken for a spy by both the bad guys (led by the creepy James Mason) and the good guys. One part comedy, one part romance — all deliriously entertaining. From the classic prairie stop scenes to the gloriously fake Mt. Rushmore climax, North by Northwest is a breathtaking ride for those staying in one place this break. Buy a ticket to travel North by Northwest — and hold on.

3. Jaws and Duel — Steven Spielberg's blockbuster holds up remarkably well, even on the small screen. Sit back and enjoy Jaws as a revenge film against everybody who's sunning it up on the beach. Roy Scheider and Richard Dreyfuss head the cast where the suspense and a pesky shark are the real stars. Just when you though it was safe . . .

For those on road trips, Spielberg's first film, a TV movie called Duel could be right up your alley. A heart-stopping thriller in which an innocent driver (Dennis

Bosstones release kickin' EP

By AMANDA GROSSMAN
Collegian Correspondent

Ska Core The Devil and More
The Mighty Mighty Bosstones
Mercury

After over a year of anticipation, all of those hard-core Mighty Mighty Bosstones fans will find supreme gratification in stores on March 16. Ska Core The Devil and More, the Bosstones' debut release on Mercury Records, is itching to jump into your burning little hands almost even as we speak.

Ska Core is a seven-song EP that will be available on CD and cassette; gone are the good old days of vinyl with this jump to a major label. In exchange for this "small" sacrifice, we are rewarded with outstanding musicianship, excellent production quality and an all-around good time. After all, that's why we love the Bosstones so much, isn't it?

The EP is not so much a showcase of to-the-bone Bosstone material as it is a tribute to the band's musical influences. Included on this EP is a new Bosstones song, covers of songs by SSD, Minor Threat, Angry Samoans, Bob Marley and two old Bosstones originals recorded live.

Their new song, "Someday I Suppose," is a catchy tune with a simple concept (and those smoking horns) that has a distinct flavor as pure Boss-Tone. Any fan of songs such as "Hope I Never Lose My Wallet" and "I'll Drink to That" will be sure to be singing along with the chorus to this one.

The cover songs fare quite well also. SSD's "Police Beat" is chilling, and "Lights Out" is much more solid than the Samoans original. Marley's "Simmer Down" is slick and swanky. Minor Threat's "Think Again" packs in as much energy as Ian ever did.

The live songs are linked together with a special secret surprise at the end (hint: stay tuned through the 38 minutes, 43 seconds and you'll see what I mean). The intro is terrific — a slick Vegas-style horn melody designed to get you on your toes. When it comes down to the nitty-gritty, the Mighty Mighty Bosstones are showmen through and through.

Ska Core The Devil and More does more than its share to tide over even the most devoted fans until their next eagerly anticipated recording: a full-length album due out in mid-April.

As a friendly P.S., stay tuned for Bosstone excitement right here at UMass. UPC will present The Mighty Mighty Bosstones live in the Student Union Ballroom on April 1. Tickets are $10 for UMass students with valid I.D. and $13 general.

You'll also want to tune into WMUA 91.1 FM on Wednesday nights from 7 to 9:30 p.m. for the "Sally Brown Ska Show" with Rudegirl Voovie, Missionary Mike and Dan Dread. They'll not only have ticket, CD and cassette giveaways, but will also be visited by special guests (hint: a band quite frequently mentioned in this review) on April 1.

When all my buddies come back from Rich Kid Island or Sexx Beach or wherever the hell it is that they go, they've got stories of fun in the sun but I've got stories of the 35-year-old stripper I met at Denny's while waiting for some of my go-nowhere friends to get off of work.

"Hmmph! You guys think you had a good time last week? Well, wait'll I tell you about the lovely Linda Lingerie. Heh, heh, heh!"

Yeah, it's going to be a blast.

Weaver) is stalked — for no apparent reason — by a massive black Mack truck. Whoever or whatever will stop at nothing to kill Weaver. An unrelenting shocker that will leave you breathless. And you thought you had trouble with back-seat drivers.

4. Man in the Moon — Take a break from the thrills with this little seen but wonderful 1991 drama directed by the same man who helmed the classic film version of To Kill A Mockingbird. There's the same, loving touch here for small town life in the '50s in this story of a young girl and her love for the new, older boy in town, who really is smitten with the girl's sister. The sterling performance of Reese Witherspoon as the young girl is the centerpiece of this truly touching film. Allow yourself to linger in the lazy rays of innocence and the pain of that first crush. The wonder years, indeed.

5. La Femme Nikita — Go abroad this break to France for this super-slick action thriller that's the basis for the upcoming Bridget Fonda remake Point of No Return. Yes, there are subtitles, but this suspenseful spy story about a female criminal who has to choose between death or a job as a government assassin is too exciting to miss because you don't want to "read" the film. For those who like their action "deep," there's also an interesting subtext about identity. Tres exciting.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): A rapid pace feels right now. You are unstoppable in reaching goals. Get a project up and running; it will soon be humming. If you need functional advice, turn to professionals.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): News from a distance gives you an emotional lift. Associates provide helpful information. Let your excellent record speak for itself tonight.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Romantic or financial turbulence may come to a head now. A willingness to compromise melts away tension. Improve the quality of a key relationship by being a good listener.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): The next two days are ideal for turning your wishes into reality. You want to circulate and connect with your soul mate. Business negotiations are favored late in the day.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): A favorable day for pooling resources, ideas and money. Whether you negotiate by phone or fax, you will strike a powerful agreement. Balance the importance of minor details with the big picture. Realize your insignificance.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Speed will help you finalize an agreement. Romantic partner's support gives you the strength of steel, the speed of a bullet, and the ability to leap tall buildings in a single bound.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Be tactful with older people, especially those in subordinate positions. Ask them to pool their efforts to improve the bottom line. Put romance on hold tonight.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Travel plans demand care. Moderation is needed in recreational activities. Curb a tendency toward overindulgence. An older person can be helpful if dealing with real estate matters.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): The spotlight is on costs, dividends and assets. A financial experiment brings interesting results. A member of the opposite sex figures prominently in today's plans.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): You deserve the best and are likely to get it now. Other people come to appreciate how special you are. Be on the lookout for new romantic opportunities and avoid them.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Resist an urge to spend your savings. Let the money you have accumulated continue to gain interest. Show wisdom where affairs of the heart are concerned. Look in your head.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Let yourself go nuts at work. You tackle jobs with real zeal when you recognize their value. A job well done often means more to you than the financial returns it processes. Arg.

NBA and the Collegian: Hardwood style

NOTES FROM THE HARDWOOD by Art Stapleton

With the A-10 Championship going on, and all of the stories this page has devoted to the Minutemen, I have decided to dedicate Notes from the Hardwood to the Rhode Island Rams, avid readers of my column in the fall, Stapleton's Pigskin Picks.

Well, the NBA season is continuing on, and this week we have a special correspondent from the other section in the paper, former sportswriter Jason George, the man with two first names. Here's a question from the all-knowing news editor:

"How can someone like Chuck Person call Christian Laettner selfish? Laettner just had nineteen rebounds in 42 minutes and Person had three rebounds in forty minutes! That shows what a real team player the Rifle Man is!"

Speaking of the Collegian, there are rumors of a possible hoop game pitting the Newsroom/Night Graphics against the Business Office. Who cares, you ask? Notes has the inside scoop on the lineups for the newsroom.

Jeff "Criss" Crofts claims to be as good an aerial acrobat as Shawn Kemp, and the second coming of Tom Chambers, "Jumpin" Jeff Hojlo, should provide the inside-outside game we so dearly need.

It seems as though Greg "I've already left for Mars" Sukiennik may bring back some special moves from his next trip home. I'll wait and see.

One lingering question is whether Dan "As smooth as a hot buttered pretzel" Wetzel will show his skills on the side of the sports desk or will he join the business staff and try to post up the ever controversial Mike "Don't call me Spike" Morrissey?

The secret weapon for the newsroom: Sources say Kristin "Spud" St. John says she can cover anyone over 7 feet tall. Considering she is only 5 feet 5 inches tall, it should be interesting to watch. Height is something that this team lacks, especially if Darienne "Too tall" Hosley, Christina "Norman" Rothwell, and Vanessa "Ready and" Adelman play. More updates in the coming weeks.

Now to the NBA: San Antonio is in a tailspin, and Houston is the hottest team in the league. The Rockets have won 11 in a row, and they are a team that has a center who knows he is a center. Hint: see the New York Knicks.

Another team that is just smoking is the Seattle Supersonics, who only dropped two games (one to the Bulls by 3) in their last 10.

Since my last column was cut to bits, you missed my tirade about John Starks' clothesline of Kenny Anderson, which now leaves the Nets without a true floor general. Well, Starks, the only thing you left that game with was a $5,000 fine. Someone caught up to you, though, and broke your nose. Who do you think paid him?

The Pistons suspended Dennis Rodman for "chronic violations of team policy and for failing to tell the team officials he would miss practice."

This man was found a few weeks ago in the parking lot of the Palace with a loaded shotgun, and you mean to tell me that the front office suspends this guy now, when he needs help most. Someone is not doing his or her job.

Well, that about wraps up my thoughts on the pro ranks, and I'll be awaiting Selection Sunday with the rest of the crew. This column will be taking it on the road following Coach Cal and the boys. I figured if ESPN can do it, so can I.

Only a few more weeks and . . . hoops at the Horseshoe. Ever hear of a legend named Stoney? Stay tuned.

Did you see that?

- Cedric Ceballos' 40 points against Sacramento.
- Manute Bol's six treys last week.
- The sign at last night's UMass-Temple game pumping up the Collegian and SportsCenter, two quality organizations.

large as a 12-point deficit to get within three points, 64-61, with 30.7 seconds remaining, on a Rick Brunson (16 points) three-pointer.

But two Dana Dingle free throws, with 21.3 seconds left, sealed the Minuteman victory and assured UMass of its second straight NCAA invitation.

Four more Minuteman free throws closed out the scoring before UMass fans rushed the floor following the final buzzer.

"I made my kids sit and watch the award ceremony because I wanted them to see a real championship team," Temple coach John Chaney said. "Usually you see losers leave the court, but I wanted them to learn from it."

Temple lead 31-30 at the half on the basis of the hot shooting of Jones (22 points for the game) and McKie (16 points, nine rebounds for the game).

UMass was unable to get the ball inside to Williams or Roe on Temple's tough match-up zone defense, but the sweet outside shooting of Jerome Malloy (17 points) kept the Minutemen close.

"Jerome Malloy kept us in the game in the first, before we could get it inside in the second half," Calipari said.

Malloy, who banked one of his five three-pointers off the glass, said, "I was feeling it in the first half. I just kept shooting. I didn't care as long as they went in."

The Minutemen are now looking for another NCAA Tournament run, but this time more successful than last season's journey to the "Sweet Sixteen."

"Our goal is the NCAAs now, but this time to advance farther than last year," Barbee said.

■ Williams

conference in my opinion," Chaney said. "Pound for pound, I don't think there's a better player anywhere. He could be the best player in the country.

"He's bigger, plays bigger, than his size. He's constantly a problem to anybody that's going to play him. He's absolutely a tough, tough player, and he's been that way for a couple of years."

Maybe it was the warrior's pride which drove the 6-foot-7 forward to prove his worth, but at any rate, McKie remained the Player of the Year while Williams went to sleep as the MVP of the Atlantic 10 champions.

SPORTS NOTICE

Students wanting to participate in the NCAA Tournament ticket drawing should drop off their student activity cards at the Curry Hicks Cage no later than noon today. Students are asked to place their phone numbers on the cards, and will be notified Monday.

Call 5-0810 if there are questions.

Congratulations to UMass, the A-10 Champions. Again. Best of Luck to the Minutemen in the NCAA Tournament.

Four final candidates for Chancellor of the Amherst campus will be visiting between March 22 and April 2, 1993. Puckers win IM title

By ANTHONY GUIDO
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts Intramural Hockey league concluded its season Tuesday night at the Mullins Center practice rink with a bang. The Mother Puckers destroyed the Hanson Brothers 7-0 to finish a two-game championship series sweep.

David Copperfield was across the way at the Mullins Center and at times it appeared that he made the Hanson Brothers disappear. The Puckers shredded the Brothers' defense with well over 10 point blank shots.

Playoff MVP Dennis Cremin, Mother Pucker team captain, was once again unbelievable in goal. The acrobatic senior goalie was clearly the shining star and the recipient of many cheers.

Cremin made 15 saves on the night, and let up only two goals in the playoffs, which lasted four games. It was a major upset as the Hanson Brothers, powered by big scorers Will Hawthorne and Jamie Podworski, had rolled to an 8-0 regular season record.

The Puckers had scoring all around, including goals from team leaders Hale Lucas and Scott Storey, who was one of the best players on the ice.

The first game of the finals was a tight checking contest in which Cremin preserved the victory throughout a physical third period. Tough Pucker wingers like Doug Saulnier were responsible for shutting down the vaunted Hanson offense in this game.

The Puckers used aggressive forechecking to wear down the Hanson defense. By the second game the Hanson defense was a bit timid and repeatedly gave the puck away.

In the Semi-finals the Puckers upset the Camel Toes 2-1, with the Hanson Brothers edging the Wolverines 2-1. The two teams were destined to meet, as this was now the final matchup for the past three years.

Amazingly, there was a great crowd for the finals at Mullins providing for a great atmosphere. Over 100 fans were in attendance, mostly rooting for the Mother Puckers.

The fact that the games were the finals added to the excitement of the crowd and led to unparalleled hitting. Frustrations boiled over into several skirmishes in the final period.

The finals ended with a Stanley Cup-like celebration in the middle of the rink, with the Puckers swarming Cremin and Storey showing tremendous enthusiasm.

For the season the intramural league had its share of stars. The best goalies included Cremin and David Daddario. The highest scoring forwards included Hawthorne, Storey and Brian Gavigan.

New lax coach named

By MATTHEW T. PARKER
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts athletic department named Francesca Den Hartog as the new coach of the women's lacrosse team last week.

Hartog, who is currently the head coach of the Yale University women's lacrosse team, will begin her tenure following the conclusion of the 1993 season. Athletic officials said Hartog gives instant credibility to the lacrosse program.

"We are extremely excited to have her," Assistant Athletic Director Carol Barr said. "She has proven herself as an athlete and coach."

Hartog is the only player in Ivy League history to be named First team all-Ivy League four times. She played at Harvard University. In her seven seasons at Yale, she has led the Elis to two ECAC Lacrosse Championships and had her squad ranked as high as seventh nationally in 1991.

"I can bring a great deal to the team," said Hartog. "I have a lot of energy, I have high-level playing experience and I have already taken a Yale team that was weak and made them competitive. I feel that I can do the same thing at UMass."

The Minutewomen will open their 1993 season next Wednesday at Harvard.

Player of the Game

Harper Williams, 6-7 Sr. Forward

Williams scored 20 points and grabbed eight rebounds en route to being named the Atlantic 10 Tournament Most Valuable Player. Williams won the MVP for the second year in a row, the first time in conference tournament history this has ever occured. He outplayed A-10 Player of the Year Aaron McKie and was called by Temple coach John Chaney, "...pound for pound, possibly the best player in the country."

Why UMass won

The Minutemen gave one of their best defensive efforts of the year in a 14-0, 6:53 second half run. UMass outrebounded the larger Owls by a 39-27 margin and were able to jump ahead while Eddie Jones, the Owls' leading scorer, sat on the bench with foul trouble.

Williams shows valor in victory

'Warrior' outplays Player of the Year McKie, earns MVP award

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

In reality, Harper Williams' chances of repeating as A-10 Player of the Year went down the tubes on December 26, which was the same day Temple's Aaron McKie's hopes immediately shot up.

On that day, two freak accidents occurred. One was Williams' break of two fingers on his right hand diving for a loose ball in practice. The other was Temple's Vic Carstarphen's freak break of his leg in the Owl's practice.

With Carstarphen out, McKie instantly became the leader on an extremely young Owl squad drudging through the toughest schedule in the country. With Williams out, McKie became a statistical front runner for the Player of the Year award, the award which he eventually won for the 1992-93 season.

Last night, however, Williams took back the bragging rights as the best player in the A-10 as his 20 points carried the Minutemen to a 69-61 victory and a second consecutive A-10 Championship.

For his effort, he received the MVP of the A-10 Tournament award for the second year in a row, the first time in conference history that feat had occurred. He said he was awed by his own accomplishment of back-to-back MVPs.

"It's a tremendous feeling, winning an award like that two years in a row in a league that's so tough," he said. "I feel proud that I got it."

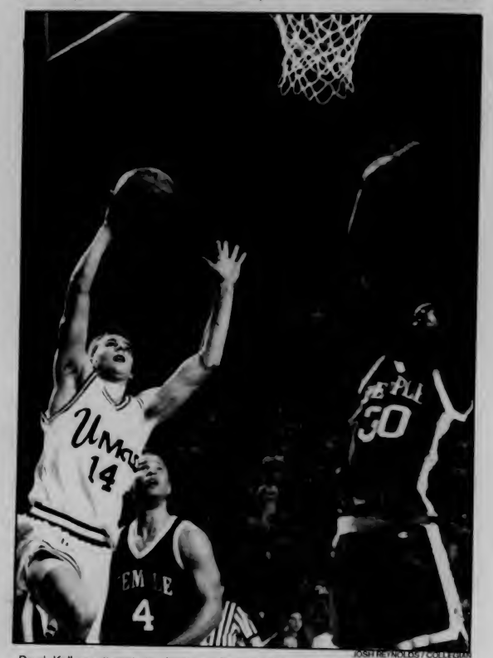
While Williams may not have been at the forefront of the action in the first half, he bided his time until the second. Meanwhile, the Player of the Year, McKie, was leading the Owls in points despite 4-for-12 shooting.

McKie had gotten open shots, but he seemed like he always wanted to shoot from farther out. Jerome Malloy, who was attempting to guard him, was giving McKie the 20-footer but the 6-foot-5 guard wanted to jump to NBA range instead.

In the second half, McKie was shut off. The Player of the Year was 0-for-6 from the field and 0-for-3 from 3-point land while Williams had taken control. With UMass down 40-34, he made the four foul shots, then dished to Dana Dingle underneath for the game-tying basket.

Williams proceeded to go outside, to foul line length, and shot two jumpers in a row that gave UMass the lead for good, putting them up by four, 44-40. Williams did not have to talk about his rivalry with McKie and did not have to state his displeasure with not winning the award, because by hitting two shots that McKie could not get to fall, he showed his worthiness on the court.

His clutch rebound (he had eight on the night) in the closing minute with UMass only up by five, 62-57, seemed to seal the game. He missed his second free throw on the subsequent foul, and Temple cut it to four. Williams never counted out Temple, who he called UMass' toughest rival.



JOSH REYNOLDS / COLLEGIAN
Derek Kellogg attempts to shoot over Temple's Jason Ivey in last night's 69-61 UMass victory in the Atlantic 10 Conference final.

"Just because in the past, they have all those wins hanging over our heads, it seems like they are the team to beat, no matter how bad people say they are."

Up five with 12 seconds left, Williams grabbed the penultimate rebound to seal the title for the Minutemen. As play stopped, McKie and Williams exchanged words until the referee broke it up. Williams hit both free throws, just to make sure, and UMass fans started screaming, "Who's the real Player of the Year? Harper is!"

McKie had the last word, a 3-point attempt with 3 seconds left. He missed. After the game, he said he did not look at this game as a battle between the last two Players of the Year.

"That's just extra stuff, those awards and all that, and I didn't think about it. I just wanted to win . . . just to do it for myself and my team. I wanted to play my hardest and win."

Temple coach John Chaney said he was unhappy with the way McKie played.

"With Aaron and Ricky [Brunson], they should have controlled the clock a lot better . . . they didn't run the [expletive] offense like they should have, and I'm pissed off at that."

The same coach who condemned his own player praised Williams on high, and with Calipari saying earlier in the week that the award should have gone to Williams, there was strong evidence for a recount.

"Harper is easily the best player in the Minutewomen fall in A-10 tourney

UM's Octavia Thomas named Atlantic 10 Rookie of the Year

By JEFF HOJLO
Collegian Staff

After defeating the University of Rhode Island in their last game of the regular season last Saturday, the University of Massachusetts women's basketball team ventured down to the Atlantic-10 tournament yesterday with high hopes.

Unfortunately for the Minutewomen, those hopes were dashed in the quarterfinals, as a tough West Virginia squad fought its way to a 12-point victory, 68-56. The loss effectively ends the 1992-93 season for UMass.

West Virginia University guard Jodie Runner scored a game-high 20 points and forward Christy Cooper added 15 points and eight rebounds to lead the Mountaineers. The win advances the Mountaineers (12-15) to the A-10 tournalment semifinals to play the winner of the Rutgers-St. Bonaventure contest later this evening. The Minutewomen finish the year at an 11-15 mark.

West Virginia had a 31-27 lead at the half, and it looked like the game would be nip-and-tuck the rest of the way. But W.V. came out of the locker room with fire in their eyes, opening with a 17-7 run to take a 48-34 lead. The run was capped by Anna Tillman's four points and Shannon Monahan's four-point play after she was fouled while making a three pointer.

UMass, led by freshman Melissa Gurile (16 pts, 11 rebs, two blocked shots), put together a run of their own and pulled to within eight at 62-54. This was the closest they would get the rest of the way.

The Minutewomen held an early 11-8 lead and were playing well on both ends of the floor, but the Mountaineers went on a 6-0 run to take the lead for good, 14-11.

Two other frosh also had big games in a losing cause for UMass. The big "O," Octavia Thomas, was a force in the paint as she piled up 13 points and eight rebounds. Teammate Tricia Hopson had one of her best games of the year offensively, scoring 11 points.

In other afternoon action at the tournament, St. Joseph's defeated Rhode Island, 72-57. The Hawks will play the winner of the George Washington-Temple contest.

Above the Rim: The post-season awards are in for the much-improved Minutewomen, and heading the list is Octavia Thomas, who was named the Atlantic-10 Rookie of the Year, an honor she so richly deserves. Fellow freshman phenom Melissa Gurile (who set a UMass single-season record of 52 blocks) also had a big year and was named to the All-freshmen team. Senior Kim Kristofik had a solid final year and was named to the third-team All-Conference.

Minutemen lose to Virginia

UMass goes home while Cavaliers advance, 71 – 56

CHRISTOPHER EVANS / COLLEGIAN
Tony Barbee slams one home for the Minutemen in Friday's game against Penn in the NCAA Tournamant.

SYRACUSE, N. Y. — At the end of their season, the University of Massachusetts basketball team was able to sneak by teams like St. Bonaventure and Penn by playing hard for only 10 or 20 minutes, but their real test would come from a team like the University of Virginia.

The question was, could UMass sleepwalk through the first half, then turn on the jets in the second half and come away with a win over the powerful Atlantic Coast Conference team?

The answer was no. The Cavaliers dominated the Minutemen in the first half, then thwarted UMass' patented second-half run on their way to a 71-56 win in the second round of the NCAA Tournament.

Guard Corey Alexander scored 17 points to lead Virginia (21-9), but it was the inside play of center Ted Jeffries (14 points, 10 rebounds) that dismantled the Minutemen (24-7).

"We've done this 16 times, this year," said UMass head coach John Calipari. "We started in the first half very tentatively, very tentative on offense and we put ourselves in a big hole. We worked so hard that we didn't have enough energy, when we got out of the hole, to finish the game."

"We're obviously very thrilled with this victory over an excellent UMass team," said Virginia coach Jeff Jones. "They dug a hole for themselves but showed character in the comeback. We had guys on our side who fought back, held them off, and then stretched out the lead, though."

The Minutemen played like zombies in the first half, allowing Virginia to score easy points in transition en route to a 36-19 cushion at the half. At that point, the game seemed to be over, until UMass went on a hellacious run that cut a 38-19 deficit to 46-43.

The run began when Calipari decided to place Tony Barbee (game-high 19 points) down low because Harper Williams and Lou Roe were ineffective. During the 24-8 run, Barbee stepped up by scoring 11 points, most of which were in the post or at the foul line.

Mike Williams came off the bench during that stretch and nailed two consecutive three-pointers with 10 minutes left, making a 45-33 Virginia advantage into a scant six-point lead.

After the Cavaliers called time out, Barbee hit four consecutive free throws, the last of which brought the

UM senior slain, custody dispute turns violent

By ALYSSA M. OWENS

A 21-year-old University of Massachusetts senior died Saturday night after she was stabbed and her house set afire by a man with whom she was involved in a custody fight.

Police found Tara Hartnett in the burned ruins of her house in Sunderland at about 11 p.m. Saturday. She had several stab wounds, but medical officials said she died of smoke inhalation.

James Cyr, 23, of Amherst, was arrested at Cooley Dickinson Hospital at about 4 a.m. Sunday when he sought treatment for cuts, police said.

Police have told UMass officials that the death appears to be related to domestic violence. They said Cyr and Hartnett were involved in a custody dispute over her 11-month-old child.

Hartnett had a restraining order against Cyr, issued Feb. 16, state police said.

Cyr faces charges of murder, arson and violating a restraining order, police said. An arraignment is scheduled for today in Greenfield District Court.

Hartnett was apparently alone at the time of the incident, police said. One of Hartnett's five roommates returned to the house about two hours later to find Sunderland and state police, ambulances and fire trucks surrounding the house and was told there was an unidentified body inside the house, a friend of the roommate who wished to remain anonymous said.

Attempts to reach several of Hartnett's roommates were unsuccessful.

It appeared that Hartnett was stabbed in the doorway and tried to run back into the house, her roommate's friend said.

"Blood was all over the walls," she said.

Police said they believe Cyr's alleged setting of the fire was premeditated.

"There was gasoline in every room," the friend said.

U.S. leaders still back embattled Boris Yeltsin

By JIM ABRAMS
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Congressional leaders voiced cautious support Sunday for Boris Yeltsin, echoing administration arguments that he remains, for now, the best hope for reform in Russia.

Senate Minority Leader Bob Dole, R-Kan., urged President Clinton to show U.S. backing for the embattled Russian president by moving their early April summit from Vancouver, Canada, to Moscow.

"I think President Clinton has a real opportunity here to go down in history as someone who may have saved democracy in that part of the world," Dole said on CNN's "Newsmaker Sunday."

Dole also questioned whether Yeltsin would be able to get back safely to Russia if he goes to Canada.

"You know, I'm not certain what might happen if Yeltsin left the country at this point," he said.

The White House had no further comment Sunday on Yeltsin's decision to declare emergency rule until April 25, when he said the government would conduct a national vote of confidence in the president. The move defied his critics in the conservative parliament, which promptly began proceedings that could lead to his impeachment.

Accused requests Bible

By GARY MITCHELL

PENSACOLA, Fla. — An abortion foe who admitted fatally shooting a doctor outside an abortion clinic asked a judge today to let him keep his Bible in jail as a legal document.

Escambia County Court Judge William J. Green ordered Michael Frederick Griffin held without bond in the Wednesday shooting.

The slaying of Dr. David Gunn was the first ever reported at an anti-abortion protest. Abortion-rights activists called it an example of growing extremism in the anti-abortion movement.

At the hearing, Griffin told the judge that he wanted to be his own attorney and "I would like to keep my Bible as one of my legal documents." The judge said those requests should be taken up with the jail administrators.

While about a dozen demonstrators picketed the clinic entrance, Gunn was shot three times after getting out of his car near the back door, police said.

"The guy just went up, chased Dr. Gunn and just shot him point blank," a witness,

Campuses angry at unfair pay

By JOHN MARCUS
Associated Press

BROOKLINE — It's not an uncommon sight in this affluent Boston suburb: the company car and driver collect the chief executive from the house he gets rent-free and take him to his job, which pays $385,000 a year in salary and deferred income.

But the company in this case is Boston University. And the chief executive is its president, John Silber, who last week battled disclosures that he also made $386,700 from the sale of a firm the university controlled.

Like the controversy over bonuses for chief executives at money-losing companies, the issue of presidential pay has become a lightning-rod for anger on campuses where tuition is rising and faculty salaries are frozen.

"The mission of a university is supposed to be to educate students," said Stacey Layton, president of the U.S. Student Association. "It's not supposed to be to make profits for the president."

Silber has said he returned the $386,700 he made from BU's sale of a small medical research firm.

But the state attorney general continues to investigate close financial ties between the university, its trustees and Silber, the unsuccessful 1990 Democratic candidate for governor, who also is entitled to $1.3 million in bonuses for skipping earned sabbaticals.

If Boston is bothered over presidential compensation, California is convulsed.

Even as student fees were being increased 24 percent, outgoing University of California president David Gardner was given a retirement package worth $2.5 million. An audit later found that Gardner spent university funds on expensive hotels close to home, first-class travel and parties.

"Everyone was absolutely horrified at the treatment Gardner got in contrast to the treatment the students and the faculty are getting," said Rosemarie Marshall, a microbiologist at California State University at Los Angeles and president of the California Faculty Association.

In July, California State University trustees approved raises for two campus presidents, in spite of budget cuts that forced some classes to be canceled. The presidents were given salaries of $128,300 and $134,800; the average pay of other CSU officials was $119,000.

"What bothers me more that these people making extraordinary amounts of money is that they become increasingly isolated from students, faculty and taxpayers," said Michael Olivas, associate dean of the University of Houston Law School and director of the Institute for Higher Education Law and Governance.

A legislative watchdog committee in Mississippi last week blasted the use of private donations for presidential bonuses at public universities. Mississippi State University President Donald Zacharias received a $66,200 supplement in addition to his $102,000 salary, for example; the money came from private donations to the university foundation. The watchdog group said Zacharias violated state ethics by not reporting the income.

Striking maintenance workers at Drexel University in Philadelphia said in December it was hard to believe

Chancellorship finalists to visit UMass campus

By CHRISTINA ROTHWELL
Collegian Staff

The four finalists for the University of Massachusetts chancellorship will be visiting the campus within the next two weeks, according to search committee members.

Luis Proenza, David Scott, Diether H. Haenicke and Claudia Mitchell-Kernan are the four finalists to replace Chancellor Richard O'Brien, whose two-year term as interim chancellor will end in June.

Proenza will meet the University community tomorrow through a series of forums that have been organized by the Chancellor Search Committee, said Marc Kenen, a doctoral student in education who is on the 15-member search committee.

Each candidate will be at the University for three days, and participate in four open forums. After the candidates give their presentations, the floor will be open for the audience to ask questions and offer comments, Kenen said.

Proenza will speak on multiculturalism to students and faculty at 9:15 tomorrow morning in Campus Center 101. At 11 a.m. Proenza will meet with faculty in Memorial Hall, and then from 3:30 to 5 p.m., he will meet with students in Campus Center 168. His last forum will be for all classified and professional University staff at 10:45 a.m. in Campus Center 168.

Proenza, who is vice president for academic affairs and research for the University of Alaska, has obtained $45 million in federal grants and contracts for polar research.

Proenza, a biologist, has a bachelor's degree from Emory University in Atlanta, Ga. and a doctorate from the University of Minnesota.

After the forums, audience members will recieve evaluation forms which the search committee will use to help rate each candidate, Kenen said.

"We will be using these to help us make our decision. So if we have the students come and they happened to like a particular candidate, [the evaluation forms] will be able to say to the search committee who they want," Kenen said. "It is either participate now or cry about it later."

"He has an outstanding record of scholarship. And he has a clear vision of what a University should be as we approach the year 2000," Kenen said. "He was very impressive in person. He gave a very impressive interview."

Student Government President Jen Wood said she plans to attend the forums and voice her opinions about the candidates.

In addition to having a chancellor who is sensitive to multicultural issues, Wood added that she would also like to have a chancellor who is going to advocate for UMass students before the state legislature in Boston.

"They need to have some proven success in creating a campus that is comfortable for students," Wood said. "I want the chancellor to be somebody who walks around and looks at people and says, 'hi how are you doing? I'm you're new chancellor.'"

"And that is not all that far-fetched. It tends to work more at smaller schools. But there is no reason why we can't get someone here who is like that," Wood said. "I think. .. the campus desperately needs to feel as if the chancellor is in touch with their issue and if the chancellor cares what is happening in their lives."

UM election sees greater voter turnout

By ALYSSA M. OWENS
Collegian Staff

The election of Al Lizana as student trustee and David Nunez as student government president, which took place the Tuesday and Wednesday before spring break, saw a significantly larger voter turnout than last year's student government election, said Jon Aronson, chair of the Undergraduate Student Senate's Governmental Affairs Committee.

Aronson said 3,696 students voted in the election, compared to last year's figure of about 2,100.

Since they would not have affected election results, 613 absentee votes were not counted, he said.

Al Lizana won the student trustee position with 1,878 votes, defeating Jeff Turco (630) and Kevin Jourdain (193).

David Nunez won the student government presidency with 1,907 votes, defeating Jennifer Fazzi (509).

The new student trustee's term will begin July 1, while the student government president will be sworn in April 1.

Voters also passed the two referendums on the ballot. The UMass Cannibis Reform Coalition's hemp initiative, a nonbinding referendum to legalize marijuana on campus, was supported by two-thirds of the voters, and students approved sending the SGA constitution before the Board of Trustees by a three-forths vote.

"There's a job to be done," Nunez said. "I think students are excited about the new leaders coming in."

Nunez said he plans to meet with Chancellor Tom Robinson and the director of University Health Services to discuss possible reforms in the service.

New DA likely to be a woman

Gov. Weld may appoint first female DA to Northwest

NORTHAMPTON (AP) — Elizabeth Scheibel has won most of her cases as an assistant district attorney in Franklin and Hampden Counties, but she doesn't dwell on her success.

"I'd like to think I've never gloated about wins," Scheibel said. "I feel strongly that there's always someone on the other side, someone who's lost."

Scheibel, 37, of South Hadley, may soon win the distinction of becoming Massachusetts' first female district attorney.

Northwestern District Attorney Judd Cahart is expected to be confirmed as a superior court judge April 14, leaving the position vacant.

Gov. William Weld said last month he was inclined to replace Carhart with "a nontraditional candidate," such as a woman, and "someone like the first district attorney" in Carhart's office — who also is, like Weld, a Republican.

"It seems to be a one-candidate situation," John Calahan, a former district attorney and past president of the local bar association, told the Boston Sunday Globe.

"I never thought she's grow up to be district attorney," Scheibel's mother said. "I thought she'd be a major league ball player."

A psycho-biology major at Mount Holyoke College, she later graduated from Western New England College law school in 1980.

Scheibel went directly to a job at the Hampden County District Attorney's Office. In 1988, Carhart asked her to become his first assistant.

A Republican in a predominantly Democratic area, Scheibel won't talk about her plans for the office even if she's named the next DA.

"I don't have a hidden agenda," she said. "My goal is to prosecute fairly and see that their rights are protected."

Steve Powell, told the Miami Herald.

Griffin, 31, was charged with murder after walking around the building and surrendering to police watching the protest, Sgt. Murray Holt said.

Griffin was dressed in a gray suit "like he was going to church," when he told the officers, "'I've just shot Dr. Gunn,'" said John Burt, a lay preacher who led the protest.

On Sunday, Griffin had offered a prayer for the doctor at the Whitfield Assembly of God Church outside Pensacola, Burt said.

"He asked that the congregation pray, and asked that we would agree with him that Dr. Gunn would give his life to Jesus Christ," Burt said. "He wanted him to stop doing things the Bible says is wrong and start doing what the Bible says was right."

Appearing on CBS television this morning, anti-abortion leader Randall Terry, who founded Operation Rescue, described the killing as an "inappropriate, repulsive act," but then went on to attack Dunn as a murderer.

"While we grieve for him and for his widow and for his children, we must also grieve for the thousands of children that he has murdered," Terry said.

Kate Michelman, president of the National Abortion Rights Action League, charged Gunn's killing was the direct result of the anti-abortion movement's tactics.

"The fact is that we, many of us, have stood silently by while a campaign of intolerance and violence has occurred in this country," Michelman said.

"Everything was gone. A room that had been filled with stuff was empty," she said. "The food in the refrigerator was burned."

"Right now the house is condemned. The windows are boarded up," she said.

Hartnett's child was living with Cyr's parents in Amherst at the time of the incident, she said.

She said Cyr had no contact with Hartnett directly after the child was born, but then began to seek custody rights last fall.

Hartnett placed a restraining order on Cyr Feb. 16 and Cyr later placed one on her "just for the hell of it," she said.

Cyr appeared in court last Thursday to face assault and battery charges made by Hartnett for a Feb. 12 incident.

Hartnett was a psychology major from South Boston. Funeral arrangements are being set for later this week.

UMass administrators reacted to her death Sunday.

"I am deeply saddened that we have lost a member of the UMass community to the ugliness of domestic violence. Our thoughts and prayers are with Tara's family," UMass President Michael Hooker said.

State Rep. Ellen Story, a member of a joint committee on criminal justice, was involved with the passage of three state laws aimed at preventing domestic violence.

"It's very clear that making laws is not enough," Story said. "People must be taught how to resolve conflicts with words instead of violence and the incredible consequences of this tragedy."

Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Tom Robinson expressed shock at Saturday's incident and said efforts are underway to help Hartnett's friends and other students cope with the violent death.

Liberals await nominee

By JILL LAWRENCE
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Their near 20-year wait for a sympathetic Supreme Court nominee is almost over, but liberals are hardly euphoric. They say it could take years to undo a generation of conservative appointments.

Most liberal activists are keeping their expectations in check as President Clinton begins his search for a candidate to succeed retiring Justice Byron White.

The new justice is sure to be more progressive than the conservative White. But liberals say the most they hope for with one appointment is an end to what they view as erosion in areas ranging from gay, civil and abortion rights to church-state relations.

"This is a very important opportunity to begin restoring balance on the court, but it is going to take a number of years before we can remedy the harm of 12 years of ideologically driven Supreme Court appointments," said Dawn Johnsen, legal director of the National Abortion Rights Action League.

The only liberals on the court are John Paul Stevens and Harry Blackmun, named by Republican presidents in 1975 and 1970, respectively. Clinton's nomination will be the first by a Democrat in 25 years.

"There's a whole country of individuals out there" jamming the judicial pipeline, said George Kassouf, director of the judicial selection project for a liberal 28-member coalition called the Alliance for Justice.

All that Democratic talent-in-waiting doesn't guarantee the newest judge will be a liberal.

Boston's mayor departs; new political era begins

By MARTIN FINUCANE
Associated Press

BOSTON — It was a typical St. Patrick's Day when Mayor Raymond Flynn sauntered into Doyle's Cafe. There were shamrock-shaped balloons, green bowler hats, drinks all around. But the toast was different.

The folks at Doyle's, and at spots all over Boston, were saying good-bye to Flynn.

The three-term Democratic mayor, who once aspired to everything from a cabinet post to the governor's office, is heading for a quiet ambassadorship at the Vatican. And politics is again the talk of the town in Boston, which has had but two mayors since the 1960s.

His decision was not even a day old when he showed up at Doyle's, and people there were already hailing Thomas Menino, city council president and mayor apparent.

"He's the next mayor of the city of Boston," said John Lynch, 49, who was celebrating with his son.

Menino will at least be mayor temporarily, if Flynn is confirmed for the Vatican post. He will serve until after a special election in November to choose a new mayor.

Menino will not go unchallenged.

At least a dozen politicians, including many of the city's top Irish-American, Italian-American, and black political figures, are considering runs.

"The whole political landscape was logjammed. Now it's opened up. You'll see a whole new generation of younger people running for office," said Michael McCormack, a friend of Flynn's for 15 years and a city counselor from 1981 to 1991.

McCormack called Flynn's exit "the best thing to happen to the city since Boston baked beans."

The coming race has an extra dimension because there never has been an Italian-American mayor of Boston and some of the major contenders, including Menino, are Italian-American.

Some Italian-American politicos feel "this is our time," said political consultant Joyce Ferriabough.

Flynn, who was highly popular in Boston in the boom of 1980s, also had been considered a possible candidate for governor against Republican Gov. William Weld in 1994.

His departure means the Democrats' three best gubernatorial candidates are all unavailable, said Paul Watanabe, a political science professor at the University of Massachusetts-Boston.

U.S. Rep. Joesph Kennedy, D-Mass. could draw on a reservoir of goodwill toward his family, but has said he prefers to remain in the House. Boston University President John Silber, who ran against Weld in 1990, has been mired in a scandal over financial dealings at his institution.

"It really moves the Democrats into a mode in which second-tier candidates are likely to come to the fore now that the big three have been crippled," said Watanabe.

In the mayoral race, the list of possible contenders includes former U.S. Rep. Brian Donnelly; city counselors John Nucci, Rosaria Salerno, Bruce Bolling and David Scondras; Lawrence DiCara, a former city counselor; Suffolk County Sheriff Robert Rufo, and former state Rep. Melvin H. King, who ran unsuccessfully against Flynn in 1983.

Whoever Flynn chooses, his popularity will be hard to duplicate. Elected in 1983 to replace Kevin White, the mayor of 16 years who was thought to have lost touch with the neighborhoods, Flynn was more likely to show up at a burning building to give firefighters a hand than to be stuck behind a desk.

"It's hard to imagine someone trying to outdo Ray in terms of riding the fire engines and driving the snowplows. That was his shtick," said Doris Kearns Goodwin, a local historian.

By 1991 he was so popular that he won a third term with an unprecedented 75 percent of the vote. And last year he stepped into national spotlight as head of the National Conference of Mayors and as a coordinator of President Clinton's campaign.

Flynn did stumble. Critics said his battles with school officials paralyzed efforts to improve the city's troubled public schools. And he took heat when police pursued what turned out to be a fictitious black suspect in the Charles Stuart murder hoax.

But Flynn truly followed in the populist tradition of James Michael Curley, the powerful Irish politician who served four terms as mayor between 1914 and 1950.

Curley, like Flynn, built a following among the city's poor and working class so strong that when he was fined $30,000 in a fraud case in 1938, thousands of citizens donated money to pay the levy.

But times are changing. And what is needed in the mayor's office now, many agree, is a policy maker and administrator who can tackle problems like the city's ailing economy and inner-city poverty.

"The appeal this time will be for something different," Goodwin said.

Flynn watchers are left to wonder whether his acceptance of the Vatican means he is saying goodbye to electoral politics.

McCormack said had Flynn remained, he would have been dragged down politically by the hard times facing the city.

Other observers said the Vatican spot could become more visible, especially given Flynn's anti-abortion stance, rare for a liberal. And they noted that for a staunch Catholic like Flynn it has great significance.

Goodwin said maybe the man of the neighborhoods simply felt it was time to move on.

"At some point it's hard to generate excitement about getting the trash picked up and the snow plowed one more time," she said. "It shows a certain kind of curiosity and courage on his part to do something totally different from what he's done his whole life."

Editorial/Opinion

The opinions expressed on this page are those of the individual writers or cartoonists and do not necessarily reflect those of the Collegian unless otherwise noted.

You say you want to go to war, but are you willing to die?

The United States of America, under the guidance of former peace activist William Jefferson Clinton, and with the most humanitarian of intentions, moves ever closer to the tragedy of military commitment to the suffering nation of Bosnia-Herzegovina.

Bosnia, Croatia, Macedonia and Serbia, at the heart of a region dominated by outside powers since the end of World War I, have been long in dispute, a dispute that started that most unprecedented of conflicts in 1914 and, despite its centuries-long duration, was ceased only temporarily by domination of the region by Germany and later by communism.

As Yugoslavia, the only non-Soviet communist entity in Eastern Europe, came in its time to fall and dissolve, the age-old battles began once again. Yet in the new age of world government and arrogant United States interventionism, it became a popular view in our land to "send in the troops" to save theirs. Ignoring as only American politicians could, the history and enmity of the region, hawkish statespersons in the United States grunted their solution to this concern and all concerns: the use of superior brute force to keep the "lesser" nations of the planet in their proper place.

This superficial view of geopolitics is what led President Lyndon Johnson, an intelligent man, to come to the conclusion that the United States could subvert communist tendencies in Vietnam. Vietnam became a communist nation; the United States had a military presence there for 15 years. Sixty-thousand Americans died.

This superficial view led to the genocide dubbed Operation Desert Storm that punished an admittedly errant Iraq by murdering a quarter-million Iraqis, mostly civilian.

Peter
J. ORVETTI

This superficial view — the catalyst for U. S. intervention in Libya, Nicaragua, El Salvador, Panama, Granada and Somalia in the last decade — threatens to rise again and involve America in an endless war, one any human being would pray to end, but one we could not end, and, dare it be said, one that is not our place to be involved.

Those surrounding Clinton and calling for "military intervention" — the New World Order term for war — in the former Yugoslavia, are victims of the arrogant superficiality that caused the militarism of the Johnson, Nixon, Reagan and Bush presidencies. They refuse to believe that not all conflicts can be defined in black and white: that many Bosnians would be opposed to the U.S. presence, that certain Serbs who would be enemies are our spiritual allies, that the Muslim population and the Croatian nation are undefined factors that could also adversely affect Mr. Clinton's war. If Bosnia is a war we cannot win, cannot end and cannot control, why do so many call for Wagnerian Gotterdammerung there? Perhaps because it is not they who would die.

No, the hawks on the Hill and the armchair generals of the Pentagon would be safe and hidden in Washington, a continent and a half away from the carnage. It is easy to vote for war when one will only see that war on CNN.

Therefore, I offer this modest proposal to Clinton and those who would lead him to war: should a military presence be established in Yugoslavia, one Cabinet member, two senators and ten representatives should be drafted for active duty, chosen by lot. Should that presence grow beyond 5,000, send three more senators and 20 more representatives; over 10,000, five more senators and an additional 20 representatives — a total of about 10 percent of Congress. Then, when it is time to consider sending further troops and continuing a hopeless war, let those remaining cast their votes with this in mind: I can send others to the killing field, but can I bring myself to vote to send myself to die?

Peter J. Orvetti is a student at Hampshire College.

A class you can really use

While sitting in my "Towards the Udder: Defining the Bovine" class the week before spring break I couldn't help but think that maybe some of my instructors were leaning towards the esoteric in their courses' contents.

Jesse
ARMSTRONG

Though I tried to banish this mutinous thought it kept returning, interrupting my thoughts during my "Writing the Shelf: Wholesale Retailing through Poetry" seminar (who could forget the immortal lines of Eliot on overeating while working a night shift: "I roll up a Twinkie wrapper, and roll it at some overwhelming question/Is it love or indigestion?" Or Lord Byron, first viewing his love in a store: "She walks in K-mart to buy a Sprite/And all that's best of 'diet' and 'lite'/Meets in her shopping cart.").

The above-mentioned courses clearly have academic value, but there is a growing sense amongst the student body that UMass would benefit from scheduling a few classes that gave instruction on how to behave in everyday life. Many such courses would surely be oversubscribed if the administration had the foresight to run them, including anything from tutorials in the painless termination of long term relationships, to a workshop on "The Shakespearean Titter" (that short guffaw the knowledgable make during performances of Renaissance plays to indicate that they realize a joke has been made even though it isn't funny).

Furthermore, courses like the current "Guatemalan Cinema: Masterpieces and Mantlepieces" (which I believe only examines one film, and to ensure a full quota of course hours shows it at one-quarter of the intended speed over eight weeks) could be replaced by a class on how to avoid conflict in the video store when four people are trying to pick a film and after three hours the only thing you can find that no one has seen is "Police Academy XXVII."

A class like Arthur Schlesinger Jr.'s Oxford summer school on slapstick humor in American history would be a most welcome addition to the curriculum.

Schlesinger managed to dig up some fascinating facts about the early republic, including evidence that initially America wasn't planned as a nation at all, but simply, as Benjamin Franklin put it in a letter to his chiropodist, "as a place to stop over until we find someplace bigger, or God forbid [my italics] move back in with our parents."

Of course the United States turned out to be a good deal larger than anyone expected, prompting Jefferson to record with excitement in his diary, "It seems there will be no end to the number of shopping malls we will be able to construct; I myself foresee owning at least 17."

While Schlesinger mocked the redcoats for their tactics in the revolutionary war, described in a military handbook of the time as "marching very slowly towards the enemy in a nice straight line," it is worth noting that with a few adaptations the same strategy was employed, with similar success, by all sides in the First World War.

The only retaliation the poor British could come up with as their forces were decimated by the American guns was to chant sexual insults at the Yankees, the favorite being to describe them as "minutemen" in reference to their sexual endurance. Curiously, as Schlesinger noted, this name has endured.

Campus crime is not kept hidden

Some items in Greg Sukiennik's column on campus safety [Collegian, March 11] need to be clarified, others reinforced.

The January 20 Chronicle for Higher Education lists crime statistics from campuses across the country responding to a new federal law requiring publication of such information. UMass, unlike many schools who took advantage of loopholes in the legislation, complied with the spirit of the law. Indeed, UMass made public crime statistics years before legislation was enacted. The last compilation was distributed in September throughout campus.

The UMass police make public a crime log for each day. The Collegian reports these listings frequently. UMass also issues figures every year on the number of rapes and other sexual assaults reported to all agencies on campus, not just the police, in order to better assess the extent of the problem and educate people. Police do not provide exact locations of rapes to help shield the identity of victims.

As for the reported assaults of March 5/6, UMass officials provided information about the incidents to the Collegian and other news organizations since that weekend.

Why does the University talk relatively freely about crime? Because the UMass campus is not a sanctuary, and University officials want students to act accordingly. Students should call the police escort service to walk them across campus at night. Use the buddy system. Know where the 62 emergency phones are located. If you know something about a crime, tell the UMass police. People with information about the weekend assaults should contact the police.

Take these precautions even though UMass police patrol campus 24 hours a day— on foot, horseback, bicycle and by cruiser, and more officers and other security personnel are being trained. Campus crime is a very serious issue everywhere. No responsible campus official anywhere would tell students they are immune from crime at school.

Israel is not a black/white issue

Jews do experience overt discrimination which some have referred to politically as anti-Semitism. But it is interesting to know that both the historical and present Semite tribes were and are composed of both Arabs and Jews.

The word Zionism is applied to the political state of Israel and its racist policies since its inception. Palestinians are systematically oppressed in Israel as second-class citizens with second-class rights. People's rights in the occupied territories are abused consistently. Their jobs, houses and freedom have all been taken.

Mr. Horowitz [Collegian, March 11], don't spend all your energy watching the violence and distinguishing between "good" and "bad" guys when it is more insightful to study the history which led to the continued violence practiced by both sides today. Combatting Israeli expansionism in the occupied territories is a defensive and reactionary measure.

As for Yehoushua Weisbrod, it is always sad to see ordinary citizens killed. But are ordinary citizens always innocent from the policies their government practices? Was Weisbrod profiting from the systematic oppression of Palestinians? Do ordinary Whites here in the United States or in South Africa profit from the systematic oppression of people of color? And do Israelis really want peace? Will they go to all lengths to achieve it, even giving up land?

I only wanted to make one point: Mr. Horowitz, do you really expect us to find sympathy for racist oppressors because they live in fear?

Student pay cut: unfair punishment

Regarding the SGA's proposal to limit the number of hours a student can work on campus and limiting all students' pay rates to minimum wage [Collegian, March 11]: The SGA has once again showed their true colors. In this myopic idea of theirs, they have failed to consider the whole story. I'm sure some students are wrongly overpaid, but for the majority of us, this is not so.

The vast majority of student employees work for a simple economic reason: to pay education and living expenses. Without working, we would not be able to stay here and earn our degrees. Without the opportunity to choose how much we work at our jobs and the ability to be rewarded for our loyalty and dedication, those of us who must work would be trapped in a system that is a far cry from free enterprise.

SGA members who believe these limitations will solve the problem of overpayment and dishonesty may be right, but at what price to the majority of honest, hard-working student employees? They would cut a vital source of our earned income. How dare they limit the hours we can work, or the wage we are paid? By what authority do they claim to know the financial situation of every student employee?

If they have the audacity to claim that a student is being wrongly overpaid, let them present their proof to that student, Chancellor O'Brien or President Hooker — or the whole SGA even! But do not accuse us all; do not punish us all without proof, any facts or any thought.

that the administration position that Yeltsin's action was "the appropriate thing to do as you're evolving a democratic institution."

Albright said Yeltsin deserved U.S. support because "he is the only one in 1,000 years of Russian history that has been elected by all the Russian people."

Sen. Sam Nunn, D-Ga., chairman if the Senate Armed Services Committee, said Clinton's stance toward Yeltsin was "about right."

"We certainly support him as the president and as the only nationally elected leader," he said.

But Nunn, speaking on NBC's "Meet the Press," said the United States should be talking to other "key players" in Russia.

The lawmakers also agreed the Russian military must be watched closely.

Sen. Bill Bradley, D-N.J., noted there is an element of the army that opposes the START II nuclear disarmament treaty. Nunn warned of a worst-case scenario where the military and the regions split apart.

"If that happens, what's going on in Yugoslavia now might look calm," he said.

One of the architects of the START II treaty, former Secretary of State Lawrence Eagleburger, said on CBS's "Face the Nation" that it was "unlikely that the military will fragment or will come out against Yeltsin unless there begins to be real civil disorder."

the school had no money for raises when its president, Richard Breslin, got a $210,000 salary, an $86,427 expense account, a free house with maid service and a $48,000 luxury car.

The University of Colorado will spend $217,000 this year to maintain a home for President Judith Albino, who makes more than $225,000. Members of the Legislature's Joint Budget Committee and Senate Education Committee charge that the expenses are excessive, but Albino says the home is used for fund-raising events and other university activities.

Leyton responded: "It's hard to make a very convincing argument that we're in the middle of tough times when it's coming from people who are raising their salaries and getting perks."

The average salary of a president at a research university was $141,000 in 1991, the last year for which figures are available, according to the College and University Personnel Association. That was up from $116,000 in 1988, a 22 percent increase.

Faculty salaries rose less than 10 percent in that time, the American Association of University Professors says.

But Thomas E. Corts, president of Samford University in Birmingham, Ala., said being president "is a very demanding job, no question about it. It is a stressful job and we don't have much stock options and so forth that you might get in the private sector."

John Silber's salary, for example, "is a full order of magnitude lower than that which he could command in the corporate sector," said BU Trustee Chairman Arthur G.B. Metcalf.

Silber's supporters credit him with increasing the university's endowment twentyfold and transforming BU into a nationally-renowned institution.

Schools are competing with private industry for top executives like that, said Corts, who heads the American Association of Presidents of Independent Colleges and Universities.

"If we are, then maybe there's a plausible case for paying them so much," responded Barbara Bergmann, an American University economist and past president of the AAUP. "But I don't think that's the case. Among our own ranks, we can find enough people who can so this kind of work, not for the money but for the pleasure of the enterprise."

Stiff competition exists among Oscar nominees

By JON LUPO
Collegian Staff

Editor's Note: This is the first in a six-part series highlighting the major nominees for this year's Academy Awards which will be presented on March 29.

This year's race for Best Actress in a Supporting Role is probably the only award that is entirely up for grabs. The nominees, all deserving save one, are a stellar grouping of today's best character actresses and a sign of things to come for some very talented women. While the Best Actress field had to search far and wide for eligible nominees, the Supporting categories, especially in the female field, offer an Oscar race that is too close to call.

The nominees are the following: Judy Davis' painfully funny performance in Husbands & Wives, coupled with an equally laudable turn in the little-seen but charming Where Angels Fear to Tread and Miranda Richardson, not only for her excellent work in Damage but also for her roles in the magnificent Crying Game and the otherwise drippy Enchanted April. Both actresses gave the very definition of supporting performances and in more cases than one outshined their lead counterparts.

As for the other nominees, Vanessa Redgrave was wonderful in Howards End, and in another year I'd give it to her, but this season the competition is tough. Her role as the owner of the country estate known as Howards End brought an almost mystical quality to the film. But she's won an Oscar before, and in the process caused an international controversy with her politically touchy comments.

Marisa Tomei turned in a hilarious performance as the very New York wife of Brooklyn lawyer Joe Pesci in the funny fish out of water comedy My Cousin Vinny. Fun to watch and worth the nomination, but Davis brought something deeper than just laughs in Husbands & Wives. It's not your year, kid.

Joan Plowright brought a certain aura of respect to the art house fluff piece known as Enchanted April. In this ensemble drama, Plowright was hardly noticeable and certainly not worth singling out. She may have years of fine performances to her credit, but Plowright brought nothing to this thin role that Jessica Tandy or even Bea Arthur couldn't have done.

So who will win? My bet is on Judy Davis, mainly because she's turned in Oscar-worthy acting time and time again, from a Passage to India up through Husbands & Wives. I wouldn't be surprised, though, if Miranda Richardson won since she's given three high-profile, highly praised performances during the year and all the votes from her work in Enchanted April and the Crying Game could pile into her corner.

Coming up tomorrow, I'll give my picks and predictions for the tight race for Best Actor in a Supporting Role. Hint: it's between a sheriff and a surprise.

New book has priceless wisdom for everyone

By LISA CURTIS

Life's Little Instruction Book, Vol. II
H. Jackson Brown
Rutledge Hill Press

In 1991 Rutledge Hill Press published Life's Little Instruction Book, a pocket sized book with a red plaid cover. That little plaid book has now sold over five million copies and shows no signs of letting up.

Life's Little Instruction Book is a collection of "Suggestions, observations, and reminders on how to live a happy and rewarding life" that Brown wrote and gave his son, Adam, on his first day of college.

"It was only meant as a personal gift, but when we at Rutledge Hill saw the book, we wanted to publish it. The rest, as they say, is history," says Bryan Curtis Marketing Director at Rutledge.

Life's Little Instruction Book, Volume II is a continuation of a father's advice to his son offering a range of wisdom and practical advice. ("Accept a breath mint if someone offers you one.")

In fact, Life's Little Instruction Book, Volume II reminded me of a lot of the advice my own parents have given me ("Take along a small gift for the host or hostess when you're a dinner guest"), but somehow these words gain more importance when they're written down by Brown.

Volume II is a warm, humanistic book, small enough to fit in a pocket or a purse, that prompts you to think of your family, your friends and the people you work with in a nicer, more respectful way.

There never seems to be enough time to do all of the little things, but Brown shows his readers in subtle words that it's really only the little things that count. ("When taking a woman home, make sure she's safely inside her house before you leave.")

Brown, who resides in Nashville, Tennessee, includes sometimes very personal reminders of what life is all about, "Never be the first to break a family tradition." Alongside these are tips that make for an easier and more efficient life, including addresses for services and catalogs.

Brown's words inspire love, generosity and hope in an effort to provide the reader with a happier, more fulfilled and more fun life. And more importantly, his instructions cut across all boundaries of sex, age, race and creed, appealing to a remarkably broad range of the population. ("Be gentle with the earth.")

Outside of the United States, translated versions of Brown's books are available in Europe, the Orient, South America and Australia.

Booksellers credit the phenomenal success of Life's Little Instruction Book to the fans who buy dozens of copies to give to their friends or business associates, which prompted Rutledge Hill Press to come out with a hard back, gift edition.

Even Ross Perot said it was one of his favorite books which added to the book's publicity.

Larry Stone, President of Rutledge Hill Press says of Volume II, "It reflects values that people know in their hearts are true."

The best part is these priceless kernels of truth can be bought for only $5.95. Read it, and then take some of Brown's advice to heart — share it with everyone you love.

H. Jackson Brown, Jr., a fountain of paternal wisdom, will release his sequel to the popular Life's Little Instruction Book in April.

CHARLOTTESVILLE, Va — The University of Massachusetts men's lacrosse team out-hustled, outshot and outplayed the University of Virginia here Saturday afternoon. The only thing the Gorillas didn't do was win.

The 5th-ranked Cavaliers, bolstered by a 3-0 fourth quarter and a stellar 22-save effort by goalie James Ireland, came back from a 9-7 UMass lead to hand the Gorillas a 10-9 opening-day loss at Scott Stadium.

UMass coach Ted Garber said he was impressed by his team's play, especially considering all but three of the team's practices were held inside due to poor weather.

"That was two months [of outside practice] against three days, and we took it to 'em," Garber said. "No other team in Division I could've done what we did today."

Former Brown coach Dom Starsia, in his first year at the helm for the Cavaliers, was quick to give credit to the Gorillas and said his team had been outplayed.

"UMass deserved a better fate today," Starsia said. "They outworked us, they hustled, they were quicker to loose balls. There was no justice for them today."

The Gorillas, down 3-2 after the first and behind 7-4 with five minutes left in the first half, rattled off five unanswered scores over a 20 minute span to take the 9-7 lead. They held the Cavs to nine shots in the third and dominated time of possession.

But Virginia, now 4-1, turned up the intensity in the fourth quarter to claim the victory. UVa attacker Eric Whitely scored once and assisted midfielders Tony Nugent and David Jones in the fourth, putting the Cavs up for keeps.

More importantly for UVa, the Cavalier defense pitched a shutout in the fourth quarter and got outstanding play from goalie Ireland, preventing UMass from reclaiming the lead or forcing overtime in the game's last six minutes. UVa weathered four UMass extra-man opportunities — three minutes of power-play advantage — and nine fourth-quarter shots on goal.

The UMass offense played even with the Cavaliers in the first period, controlling both possession and tempo. Meanwhile, the defense, led by transfers Jim Byrnes and Matt Noone, asserted itself with solid stickwork and physical checking.

Virginia then embarked on a 4-2 run early in the second, taking full advantage of UMass' problems clearing the ball — 8-for-16 in the first half — and scoring off unsettled situations.

But with five minutes to go in the half, the Gorillas warmed up. Attacker Mark Millon (3 goals, 2 assists) scored twice and assisted two other goals in UMass' 5-0 mid-game run, feeding freshman middies Eric Triolo and Eric Bailey from behind the cage.

Millon gave UMass an added emotional boost, finishing the first-half scoring on an extra-man with four seconds left in the half. He took a precision feed from Greg Kline in front of the crease and one-timed the ball past Ireland, making the halftime score 7-6 in favor of Virginia.

Kline lead the Gorillas with three assists, all coming from behind the crease. Mike Valente added two scores and Bill Edell and Wes Depp added a goal and an assist each for UMass. Four UVa players scored two goals apiece.

UMass gobbled up 60 of 101 ground balls, outshot UVa 55-40 and received a stellar effort from face-off specialist Sam Joseph. Joseph won 16 of 23 face-offs, helping UMass keep a firm grip on time of possession.

"[Joseph] was the best face-off man in the country today," Garber said.

Rather than try to run with the Cavaliers, UMass played a patient attack which emphasized ball control and a minimum of mistakes. Garber said he was proud of his team for executing the patient, defensive-minded game plan and coming within a goal of what would have been a surprising upset.

"That's what we tried to do," said Garber of the deliberate pace of the UMass attack. "We worked the game plan to perfection. They didn't beat us 6-on-6 at all."

The goaltending of Ireland, however, combined with a 3-for-11 power play (0-for-5 in the second half) kept the Gorillas from opening up their two-goal lead. Millon noted two examples where Ireland robbed him of sure goals.

"I was coming down the middle and I wound up and cranked right at the left corner. He didn't have time to move his stick, he just kick-saved it. The other time I shot high and either he got his stick on it or it hit him. . . he had a great game."

"Right now he's our MVP," said Starsia of Ireland, a junior from Garden City, N.Y. and high school teammate of both Depp and Adam Kohart. "I haven't seen a better game by a goalie yet this year."

While Ireland had a career day in goal, the efforts of UMass goaltender Rip Correnti (11 saves) did not go unnoticed. Correnti turned in a strong second half performance, holding UVa scoreless in the third quarter. He did allow seven goals in the first half, but many were off of rebounds or point-blank, one-on-one shots.

"Rip put up a wall," said Garber of Correnti's performance. "Virginia scored a couple of garbage goals on him. . .we didn't get any garbage goals."

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Avoid renewing old arguments with family members. There are occasions when one should forget as well as forgive. Use your organizational talents to get a fund-raising drive on track.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Rewards obtained through gainful employment are a sure thing. Those expected from games of chance seldom materialize. Tackling your jobs with zeal will earn your co-worker' respect.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Concentrate on an important work project during the early morning. Later on, interruptions will be irritating but unavoidable. Sidestep any involvement in your co-worker's affairs.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Do not harbor any illusions regarding outdated economic practices. What was profitable yesterday could be impractical today.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): The creative streak you now have going will benefit you even more if you adopt an associate's ideas. Take regular rest breaks. Buck the conversation tide and let you innovative side emerge.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): A long-cherished wish could now come true if you really push for it now. Utilize your network of contacts near and far — reach for the stars!

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Set your personal affairs aside today, even it certain things are really bugging you. Focus on the job — that is where satisfaction and financial success lie.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Opening new channels of communication at work puts you on the right track with colleagues. If you can settle a problem quietly and privately...

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Make "business as usual" your motto today. Remove yourself from a potential clash between co-workers. Otherwise, neither you nor your associates will feel at ease.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): A domestic or career snag could hinder progress this morning. Avoid being part of the problem. Limit the hand-wringing and search for practical solutions.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Plotting the future gets you back on course. A business or legal pact is strengthened. Overseas players may assist. Keep sight of your long-term goals.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): You and a co-worker discover that you have more in common than you realized. Higher-ups will make an important concession. Even a token gift would mean a lot to a loved one.

Join the fight against hunger. Here's your weapon.

Now each time you use the Card, you help buy a meal for a hungry person.

Our goal? To help buy 1,000,000 meals* for America's hungry. And you can take part just by using the American Express Card.

You see, each time you charge a purchase to the Card between March 15 and April 30, 1993, you help pay for one meal. The more purchases you make, no matter how big or small, the more meals you help provide. It's that simple.

To make it all work, we've teamed up with Share Our Strength, a nationwide non-profit organization fighting to end hunger. They're doing it in some very resourceful ways.

For example, most restaurants have extra food at the end of the night, but they don't always know what to do with it. SOS does. They see to it that the food is delivered to those who need it. In fact, they've mobilized more than 5000 restaurants to join the fight against hunger, here in the U.S. and around the world.

So remember, now one of the most valuable reasons to use the Card isn't for what you can get, but for what you give.

If you're not currently a Cardmember, but would like to apply, please call us at 1-800-365-AMEX.

The American Express® Card.
When you reach for it, you reach out to help others.

*American Express will donate $.09 per transaction, up to $90,000, a maximum of 1,000,000 meals. Donation is not deductible for income tax purposes.

Minutemen within 3, 46-43.

They would never get closer. Two 10-second violations and a backcourt violation by Virginia were not called by referees, taking the wind out of UMass' sails.

Before the Minutemen knew it, the Cavaliers took the game back. Jason Williford (14 points) snatched up an offensive rebound past the sprawling Minutemen, put it in the basket and converted his foul shot to give Virginia a 49-43 lead with 7:38 left.

"I think Jason's play, with the game in the balance, really set the tone," said Jones. "It was ironic because that type of play was what got UMass back into the game. That was a big, big point in the game, and it may have been poetic justice."

When Roe fouled out with 6:52 left, UMass' hopes grew slimmer. Jeffries converted the free throws on the foul to build the lead to eight, and Alexander drained a back-breaking three-pointer that put the Cavaliers up 11, 54-43. UMass never recovered.

"You can't play 14 minutes against these guys," said Derek Kellogg. "Our second half showed we can play against just about anybody, but against an ACC team like this, it showed you have to play a full 40 minutes."

The loss ended UMass' aspirations of a return to the Sweet 16, the NCAA Regionals next week at the Meadowlands Arena. It also ended the careers of seniors Tony Barbee, Harper Williams and Kennard Robinson, seniors who had helped UMass basketball rise up from nowhere.

"I'm definitely disappointed," said Barbee. "The expectations were high but our goals were even higher. I feel like I let the team down. I thought we could do a lot in this tournament."

"I feel I let the team down," said Williams. "I didn't go after every loose ball, or play the type of defense that I usually play."

The two senior starters did, however, bring a team which lost the first collegiate game to a Division II Lowell team at the Curry Hicks Cage 91 wins, two A-10 regular and post-season titles and three wins in the NCAA Tourney as well as a trip to the NIT Final Four. Both will be missed as much for the intangibles as for what numbers they compiled, according to teammates.

"Those two guys built this program to where it is," said Roe. "I'm gonna miss Harps, he's a warrior, a relentless player and Tony's a real leader on the floor. I'm gonna miss them a great deal."

area, complete with dining tables and a giant television screen. The other half, behind a monstrous curtain, holds the basketball court.

• None of the games were sold out and for good reason. Besides UMass' 54-50 victory over Pennsylvania, the five other games were blowouts.

• The school with the rowdiest fans had to be Coppin State. The small but wild contingent whooped it up when the Eagles, the region's 15th seed, took a three-point first half lead over Cincinnati. The Bearcats ended up winning by 30.

Player of the Game

UVa

Ted Jeffries, 6-9 Jr. Center

Ted Jeffries, the 247-pound behemuth from Virginia, scored 14 points and added 10 rebounds. He shut down Harper Williams and Lou Roe was unable to accomplish anything down low either. Jeffries turned out to be the most formidable big man UMass has faced.

Why Virginia Won

The Cavaliers came ready to play, and the Minutemen did not. Virginia outrebounded UMass 44-37 and buried them in the first half. By the time the Minutemen had fought back within three, they lost the stamina needed to close out the game and Virginia refused to lose.

Atlantic 10 triumphs over critics

Conference's success in NCAA tourney proves doubters wrong

By DAN WETZEL
Collegian Staff

SYRACUSE, N.Y. — When George Washington received the final at-large bid to the NCAA Tournament two weekends ago, upping the number of Atlantic 10 teams participating in March Madness to four, there were grumblings heard from around the country.

Many claimed the A-10 was overrated, undeserving of four bids, especially since the vaunted Big East had received only three tournament spots. Some questioned if the Colonials were worthier of a bid than a nationally-ranked Nevada-Las Vegas team or a streaking Providence club.

Others, including ESPN's Dick Vitale, complained too much emphasis was being placed on those mystical "power rankings," which proclaimed the A-10 as the fourth toughest conference in the nation.

Despite the groans, four A-10 teams, GW, Massachusetts, Temple and Rhode Island, suited up for NCAA Tournament play, while two other conference teams, West Virginia and St. Joseph's entered the NIT. The team's play may have answered the A-10s critics.

All four NCAA teams won in the first round, highlighted by GW's, 82-68, upset of New Mexico, the no. 5 seed in the West Region. And both Temple and GW advanced to the "Sweet Sixteen." By the end of the second round, the A-10 had arrived.

"The A-10 isn't the little sister anymore," said the Associated Press' Jim O'Connell, one the country's foremost experts on college basketball. "They are proving those goofy power rankings true. They have six out of their eight teams playing and winning in the post-season. That's a number most conferences would kill for."

While the A-10 has turned heads with this season's success, all agree that the conferences true worth must be proven over the next couple of years.

"I want to see whether there are programs other than Temple who are more than the products of individual genies, i.e. (GW coach) Mike Jarvis and (UMass coach) John Calipari," said Boston Globe columnist Bob Ryan, a respected basketball expert. "Let's not be naive, John Calipari is not going to be easy to hold onto and Jarvis is not staying at George Washington and being the Mr. Chips of boggy-bottom, trust me on that one.

"Then can these schools eventually withstand the loss of these dynamic individuals. I see a league based on these individuals, not a league, ala the ACC, based on tradition. The next phase is the tough part."

It is true much of the A-10s success is the direct result of the efforts of the league's young coaches and when programs with greater resources come a calling, it will difficult for the coaches to remain in the A-10.

While the league's power ranking is impressive, very little else is. Facility wise, save UMass and West Virginia, the league is more on par with the North Atlantic Conference than the Big East. Consider, that even UMass' sparkling new Mullins Center, the league's finest arena, seats only 9,500. Certainly a big step from the Curry Hicks Cage or St. Joseph's tiny, 3,200-seat home court, but a far cry from a 20,000-seat arenas most big name programs play on.

While difficult to imagine Calipari, Jarvis or St. Joseph's John Griffin spending the next 20 years in the A-10, it is not entirely out of the question.

"I wouldn't be surprised to see John stay in Amherst and turn the program into a dominant one," O'Connell said. "I know John loves it up there and the way the community has embraced him.

What he future holds is uncertain, but a least in the present, the A-10 has proven its worth.

The NCAA Tournament brought the Commonwealth's most respected writer, Bob Ryan of The Boston Globe, to help cover the University of Massachusetts basketball team.

Ryan gave credit to head coach John Calipari for the Minutemen's recent success, saying he was impressed with the job Calipari has done and offered his opinion on the state of Umass basketball.

On UMass' two-year run:

"Considering that, circa 1985, I did a story on what ever happened to UMass basketball and why did they secede from New England and join this ridiculous basketball conference (the Atlantic 10) that no one had ever heard of, obviously I am impressed with the job John has done out here.

"I never thought it could be done the way it was done. Period."

On Calipari's future:

"I don't care how many year contract he has signed, common sense will dictate that someone with better resources will want him and want him soon. Even more for the job he has done this year with less talent, than last season.

"In my mind, undoubtedly, John Calipari will either be a Hall of Fame coach as a collegian or eventually go for the NBA. He has all the earmarks as a guy who could be coaching in the NBA Finals in 10 years and not the Final Four.

"As for the immediate future I can't speak for him, because I don't think he even knows."

On next season's team:

"All I hear about is this is supposed to be a phenomenal class coming in. When you put that on top of a good nucleus coming back, you have a winning team. In two years, with the maturity, you have a fantastic team.

"But look at UConn. They had a vaunted high school class come in and now they are burning. Sometimes they work out, sometimes they don't."

On a possible UMass-Boston College (Ryan's alma mater) match-up:

"I would love to see a UMass-BC game. I think we're at the point where BC needs the game. I know John has gone on record as saying he doesn't need it anymore, but it would be funny though because John can dictate the terms. I guess we should all start putting pressure on BC."

• Prior to the Virginia game, Calipari was asked what advice he would offer to Cavalier coach Jeff Jones, who at age 33, is a year younger than Calipari. The fifth-year coach responded, "Stay in the coaching box."

• The only time the crowd in Syracuse got on its feet this weekend was during the University of Cincinnati's dance team (14 women, dressed in racy outfits) halftime performance.

• At the Carrier Dome, one half of the football field is used as a giant concession

SYRACUSE, N.Y. —The UMass basketball team came back from a nine-point first half deficit to defeat UPenn 54-50 in last Friday's first round NCAA Tournament action from the Carrier Dome.

UMass, which trailed 17-9 through the first half, was down only two, 22-20, at the half. UMass went for good when sub Mike Williams, playing for the first time in seven games due to a fractured hand, hit a 3-pointer to put UMass ahead 33-30 with 15 minutes to go. Williams responded by leading the team with 13 points.

"We didn't play particularly well in the first half, but give credit to Penn. They played tough," said UMass head coach John Calipari. "At this point in the season, a win's a win, so we'll go on."

The Quakers made things tight with less than a minute to go, coming within two points with 7.8 seconds left. Harper Williams (10 points, 10 rebounds) iced the game by hitting two free throws with six seconds left.

Lou Roe had 11 points and 11 boards. Barry Pierce led Penn with 15 points.

Suspect arraigned in death of student

By ALYSSA M. OWENS

GREENFIELD – An Amherst man was arraigned yesterday in the slaying of a University of Massachusetts senior in Greenfield District Court.

Judge Thomas Merrigan entered innocent pleas on behalf of James R. Cyr Jr., 23, of Amherst, to murder, arson, violation of a restraining order and assault and battery by means of a dangerous weapon, a knife.

The body of Tara Hartnett was found late Saturday by firefighters after they dosed flames that gutted her Sunderland home. Hartnett had several stab wounds, but medical officials said she died of smoke inhalation.

Police Chief Kenneth Heim said Cyr Jr. was in a custody battle with Harnett, 21, over their 11-month-old child, Meghan.

Hartnett had obtained a restraining order against Cyr Jr. on Feb. 12 and Cyr Jr. had taken out a restraining order against her the following day, Heim said.

Cyr Jr. was arrested at about 4 a.m. Sunday at Cooley Dickinson Hospital, when he sought treatment for cuts on his hands, police said.

The arrest came after an unidentified caller, believed to be Cyr's father, telephoned Northampton police and summoned them to the hospital, said State Police Lt. Thomas Soutier.

Cyr Jr. is currently being held without the right to bail in the Franklin County House of Corrections.

His case will be presented to the grand jury of Franklin County, probably next week, where his indictments will be reviewed and the case referred to the superior court of Franklin County, said State Police Investigator Kevin Murphy, who made the arrest. Cyr Jr., whose hands were heavily bandaged, told Murphy in yesterday's arraignment that he was stopped at a red light on the UMass campus Saturday night, when someone opened his car door and lunged at him with a

Service for victim to be held tonight

A service memorializing University of Massachusetts senior Tara Hartnett will be held tonight at 8 p.m. on the Campus Center Concourse.

The purpose of the service is to gather and share thoughts and memories of Hartnett, who died of smoke inhalation after allegedly being stabbed by her boyfriend late Saturday, said Dean of Students JoAnn Vanin.

The service was organized yesterday by a small group of Hartnett's friends who encourage people who knew Hartnett to come and speak about her, Vanin said.

Hartnett spent a lot of time on the Campus Center Concourse and enjoyed the company of lots of people, a service organizer said.

Vanin asked the campus community and media sources to respect and not intrude upon the service.

Supporters testify for privacy bill

Tell state it is necessary in fight against rape, violence

BOSTON (AP) — Supporters of a bill to protect victims of rape and domestic violence from having their medical histories scrutinized by defense attorneys said Monday that the Legislature must act to protect their privacy.

The bill would reverse a trend in recent state court decisions that supporters say have eroded privacy right for victims of rape and domestic violence, by making it easier for defense attorneys to gain access to their counseling and medical files.

Maggie Lant, a rape victim, said knowing that a defense attorney, two district attorneys and judge were going through five years' worth of her medical records made her feel like a victim all over again.

"It was like their hands were all over my body," said Lant, who testified before the Committee on the Judiciary.

House Minority Leader Peter Forman, R-Plymouth, a sponsor of the bill, said the court has now created a system where some counselling records are open to the defendant. If a victim is counselled at a rape crisis center or by specially trained domestic violence counsellors, then the information is protected.

But if a victim sees a psychotherapist, social worker or is counselled in a hospital-based program, the files are open to the defense.

"As result, many victims will not seek counselling or be open about their history in the counselling session," Forman said.

The measure also received support from Beth Israel Hospital's rape crisis center and from a coalition of rape crisis and battered women service groups.

"Because of their concerns about who may have access to these records or what they will be put to, survivors are refusing to answer many critical questions about their past and present medical, social and psychiatric histories," Beth Israel officials said in a letter to legislators.

Forman's bill would protect the counselling notes

Some want UMass Legal Services back in court

By CHRISTINA ROTHWELL
Collegian Staff

Before 1987, University of Massachusetts students, by paying their student activities fee, could have free representation in court. But now University Legal Services can only counsel students about what legal action they can take and refer students to other lawyers.

The Board of Trustees took away Legal Services ability to sue others and the University, in August 1987.

Arlens Barosy, who was a assaulted last fall and had racial slurs written on his floor, had to settle his case with the University out of court, said Legal Service Senior Staff Attorney Thomas Coish.

Each year Legal Services, which is funded by the Student Activities Trust Fund, recieves about 2,000 University students seeking legal advice, said Coish, who has been a Legal Services lawyer for eight years. And although University students pay into the trust fund that pays his salary, Coish and other Legal Services lawyers must refer students to private lawyers.

To make matters worse, Coish said it is nearly impossible to refer consumer and landlord tenant cases.

"For those cases where we were not able to refer, the student goes without representation and essentially has been ripped off," Coish said. "We still have hundreds of cases that if taken to court they would have made a difference."

When Legal Services had full litigation powers, Coish added, less than 20 percent of the cases were to sue the University.

Chancellor Richard O'Brien said he submitted a request suggesting that Legal Services should have the right to sue off-campus participants, but not the University, to the Board of Trustees.

Board of Trustee member Gordon Oaks said he can not understand why litigation rights are being raised, since students can go to many of the lawyers located in the valley. He also said that Legal Service lawyers are University employees and therefore should not be allowed to sue the University.

Referring to the federal law that anyone who is unable to afford a lawyer in criminal and some civil cases, Oaks said students should be able to get a lawyer.

But Coish said if students are still dependents, then the federal government is going to look at their parent's income and most likely deny them an attorney. He added that local legal services are swamped, and have told him they cannot take on a majority of the student cases.

Student Trustee Kevin Newnan, calling the situation "ludicrous," said he wants Legal Services to have litigation powers for landlord/tenant issues and suggested students take their case for Legal Services' litigation rights to the Legislature.

"[The Board of Trustees] consider it a done deal, so I suggest the legislature," Newnan said.

State Rep. Stanley Rosenberg is introducing a bill, allowing Legal Services to litigate against individuals off-campus, before the Education Committee. Whether Legal

Minority engineering director hired

The University has named Julius T. Randall as associate director of the Minority Engineering Program in the University's College of Engineering.

The Minority Engineering Program provides academic support for minority students enrolled in engineering and also conducts a six-week pre-college program, Minority Engineering Freshman Orientation, for freshmen and community college students.

Randall, who will replace Dwight Tavada, was the academic coordinator at William Paterson College in New Jersey for the past four years. Tavada now recruits and retains minority engineering graduate students at the General Motors Institute in Michigan.

Randall holds a bachelor's degree in computer science from the New York Institute of Technology and a master's degree from the Pratt Institute in New York.

Amherst president to step down

Amherst College President Peter R. Pouncey announced earlier this month that he will resign as president of Amherst College on June 30, 1994.

Pouncey was formerly a professor of classics at Columbia University when he was elected by the Amherst trustees as Amherst's 16th president in July 1983.

Puncey said he will take a sabbatical leave for the 1994-95 academic year and then rejoin the college's faculty as a professor of classics.

University to sponsor Russian filmmaker

Russian filmmaker and journalist Marina Goldovskaya will give a showing of her most recent documentary, "Shattered Mirror," at 7:30 p.m. on Monday, April 19 in Merrill III at Amherst College.

Goldovskaya is currently the Distinguished Visiting Luce Professor at Vassar College. She has made more than 50 films and received 24 film awards.

Goldovskaya's visit is sponsored by the University's Interdepartmental Program in Film Studies, Amherst College's Russian department and the Five College Peace and World Security Studies Program.

Professors receive awards

• Associate Professor of History David Glassberg has been awarded a fellowship from the National Endowment for the Humanities.

Glasseberg, who heads the history department's public history program, will use the fellowship to research the role of historical images in American culture.

Glassberg has taught at the University since 1986. He recieved his bachelor's degree from the University of Chicago and his masters and doctoral degrees from Johns Hopkins University.

• University of Massachusetts forestry Professor David B. Kittredge Jr. has received the James W. Toumey Award from the New England Society of American Foresters.

The award, which recognizes outstanding service to the Society, was presented at the group's seventy-third Winter Meeting in Portland, Maine.

Kittredge, who has taught at the University since 1987, received his bachelor's degree from the University of Vermont, and his master's and doctoral degrees from Yale.

Hotline to help curb harassment

Service from Human Relations to premier next week

By JENNIFER BARROWS
Collegian Staff

Many students who experience incidents of harassment on campus fail to report them because they are unaware of the services which are available to them, according to officials from the University's Office of Human Relations.

University student Steve Sparling, in conjunction with Director of Human Relations Grant Ingle and Assistant Dean of Students Paul Vasconcellos, has started a peer hotline he hopes will work to guide students who have experienced harassment or other forms of intimidation during their time on campus.

"The concept of this hotline is to provide a user-friendly service to students," Sparling said. "It will attempt to put the campus together."

The hotline will be run by a panel of students who have been attending a one-credit training class. The students are trained to handle incidents of intimidation and harassment ranging from lesbian, gay and bisexual issues to affirmative action concerns.

The trainees have undergone approximately 16 hours of training in phone skills, listening and offering advice to callers, though they are not trained in counseling, Sparling said.

"We are not here to provide mental health services, but we will refer callers to the authorities that can handle their problems," Sparling said. "If someone who calls requests immediate help, we will try our best to send someone out on campus to either walk them home or to wherever they need to go."

In addition to responding to calls, the peer assistants will present information in residence halls and Registered Student Organizations.

Sparling said other activities will include videotaped workshops on the Housing Services Cable Network and public service announcements on the radio.

"We hope to utilize cable services and hold workshops on things like date rape, hate crimes and student rights," Sparling said. "We hope to be able to provide services that are cut because of the budget crisis. . . we want to provide more than what the police are able to provide."

The hotline, 545-1272, will be open between 5 and 9 p.m. on weekdays beginning March 29 and through voice mail at other hours.

Cape Verdean week to begin with history

By SANDRA ROSE
Collegian Staff

Today is the first day of events celebrating Cape Verdean Awareness Week at UMass.

The Cape Verdean Student Alliance has planned out a series of programs for the week and the 8th Annual Cape Verdean Awareness Day Conference to be held on Saturday.

"A lot of people don't know about our culture, and we want to bring about an awareness," said Ana Lisa Silva, vice-president of the Cape Verdean Student Alliance.

Sidonia Ferreira, academic advisor for the Collegiate Committee for Education of Blacks and other Minority Students, is speaking on the history of Cape Verde tonight at the Campus Center in room 168 at 7 p.m.

According to Ferreira, "Cape Verde is a group of 10 islands off the coast of West Africa approximately 400 miles from Senegal. Cape Verde was discovered in 1462 by a Portugese navigator and served as the 'seasoning point' for slaves being shipped from mainland Africa to the New World. Seasoning is the term used to describe what the colonizers did to break the spirits of the African captives and to keep them down. From 1959 to 1974 an arms struggle was waged against the Portugese colonizers in West Guine-Bissau by Cape Verdean natives. The Cape Verdean people gained their independence in 1975."

According to the press release, other events for the week include: a musical video on famous Cape Verdean musicians, a panel discussion on issues concerning people of African descent, and a performance by Nzinga, a Cape Verdean dance troupe from New Bedford.

Write-ins dominate Board of Governors

Students won seats on the Board of Governors with more than 600 votes or fewer than six.

In elections for the Board of Governors March 9-10, names officially listed on the ballot as candidates gained hundreds of votes. But in some cases, candidates could win seats with write-in votes of four, depending on what constituency they ran to represent.

Winners of six available at-large seats were Jennifer Griffith, re-elected to the board with 698, newly-elected Angela Dusenbury with 652. Robert Lee was re-elected with 626 and Daniel Gordon with 614. All were listed on the ballot.

Christopher Schork, a write-in candidate but current board member, won the fifth at-large seat with 17 votes and write-in Diego Figueroa won the sixth seat with 15.

Five available seats from Southwest were won by Mary Perrone with 242 votes, Brian Leake and Sean Case each with 14, Richard Zeigler with six, and Edward Azar with five. No one elected from Southwest is currently on the Board.

George Fitzgerald was on the ballot and re-elected to the seat from Sylvan with 138 votes, and Aaron Smith, on the ballot from Orchard Hill, was re-elected to the Board with 130.

Robert Fitzgerald was elected from the Greek Area with seven votes and Thomas Keane was elected from Central with four. Keane, however, has already said he will not accept the seat.

Newly-elected governors written in for three seats from the Commuter Area are Amy Schulman with eight votes, Mike Carvalho with four votes,

Parade-goers brave weather to celebrate St. Patrick's Day

HOLYOKE (AP) — It was a day for big, thick Aran sweaters and heavy tweeds as this city settled by an Irishman in 1663 celebrated the green with its 42nd annual St. Patrick's Day parade.

A brisk morning snow storm kept crowds down Sunday to less than one third of the 275,000 people that turned out for last year's parade.

Holyoke Police Captain Steven Donahue said the crowd was genial and well behaved as he surveyed streets only lined two and three deep with parade viewers where normally they would be packed eight or 10 deep. He said officers arrested two people, who had sought a bit too much bottled warmth.

"It's always perfect weather when Irish eyes are smiling," maintained Grand Marshal Maurice J. Ferriter as he stepped out before a kilted pipe band.

Some loyal parade-goers were able to make good use of the drifts that volunteer snow shovelers had been unable to clear completely from the 2.9 mile parade route.

"We wouldn't have been able to see without this," said Maureen Grady of Boston perched atop a giant pile of snow at the corner of Northampton and Carolton streets.

funded all the events for the week, but received assistance from the Cape Verde Embassy, said Silva. "They suggested various people to speak at the conference and helped get us in contact with them."

The conference will be held in the Campus Center auditorium. Dr. Bruce Rose, dean of Student Affairs at Hudson County Community College in New Jersey, will be giving the key note address.

Some of the issues that will be addressed in the afternoon sessions of the conference are: problems facing non-English speakers in the health care system, Cape Verdean and Native American interrelations, and health care in Cape Verde, said Silva.

After the conference, a Cape Verdean dinner will be served following a dance featuring Jam Band.

There are over 250,000 people of Cape Verdean descent in New England, said Ferreira. "Cape Verdeans have been in New England since the 1700s and is one of the recognized ethnic groups in Massachusetts."

"We're here. We exist. We have a rich culture that is an integral part of American culture," said Ferreira.

made by qualified counselors, regardless of where they work.

It would also require judges to issue rules for reviewing records that have been released to the defense and required victims and record keepers to be notified if records have been sought.

William Leahy, chief counsel for the agency that provides legal services to the poor, said the bill threatens a defendant's right to a fair trial. He also said the requirements for reviewing records would impose a difficult burden on defense attorneys. "It makes a fundamental change in the access of all kinds of records, not just records of alleged sexual assault."

butcher's knife. He said he held up his hands in defense and was stabbed before he hit the accelerator and escaped.

A medical worker at Cooley Dickinson noticed that Cyr Jr. smelled of smoke and his hair was singed when he sought treatment early Sunday morning, according to the affidavit.

Cyr Jr. told Murphy he burned his hair Saturday after returning home at 9:30 p.m. to Puffton Village, where he lives with his parents. He said at that time his parents and his daughter were asleep and he singed his hair on a gas stove when he stooped to pick up a phone receiver he dropped.

Hartnett's parents were in Springfield yesterday, attempting to gain custody of her child, who is currently living with Cyr Jr's parents, according to a report by television station WBZ of Boston.

Cyr Jr. was enrolled at UMass in the 1991-92 academic year. He was a transfer student from Greenfield Community College.

Hartnett was a senior psychology major from South Boston. She expected to graduate this summer.

A student who took a junior year writing class with Hartnett said, "She was kind of quiet, but very friendly and sweet," said the student, who wished to remain anonymous

"She usually wrote about her child and being a mother and a student," she said.

She said she knew Cyr Jr.'s parents looked after the child but was unaware of any problems between Cyr Jr. and Hartnett.

Preventable violence

Tara Hartnett, a UMass senior psychology major, died Saturday night in her home in Sunderland after she was stabbed and her house set on fire. Police accounts of her death create a painfully familiar picture of yet another victim of domestic violence.

We read about the rising tide of domestic violence against women each day. According to the Massachusetts Coalition of Battered Women, a woman dies from domestic violence every 13 days in this state. In 1990, this number was one in every 22 days.

Tara Hartnett was the tenth woman to die as a result of domestic violence in Massachusetts in 1993. Sadly, it sometimes takes a tragedy for us to realize that victims are not numbers, but real people with families and friends.

Tara Hartnett's passing would have been tragic under any circumstances, but here is more so because her death was needless, violent and preventable.

In mid-February, Tara Hartnett issued a restraining order against her alleged murderer. It obviously wasn't enough. Just last year, 50,000 restraining orders were issued in Massachusetts. Forty-six women, children and bystanders died as a result of domestic violence.

The battering of women by both past and present boyfriends and husbands cannot be tolerated. Anti-stalking laws have only recently been implemented, and are long overdue. We must do more, through legislation and education, to end the violence and the fear.

Somehow, some people believe violence is necessary and appropriate in dealing with relationships gone awry. Violence simply isn't acceptable, and we must make that message clear.

The Collegian expresses its heartfelt condolences to the family and friends of Tara Hartnett, and to all affected by domestic violence.

The loss of Tara Hartnett is a painful one for her family, friends and the entire University community. Painful for all of us because she represents those who have fallen through the cracks of a complacent society and those who may yet fall. We have a long way to go in the struggle against domestic violence.

Why don't we aid Russia?

"Let's spend as much on Russia as Somalia: two billion dollars, no more, no less!" — Dimitri Simes, Carnegie Foundation expert on Russia.

Russia is on the verge of civil war. The surrounding republics are renewing ancient rivalries with dangerous new weapons. No Yeltsin means no dismantling of the former republic's nuclear arsenals and no reduction of Russian warheads, as under Start II.

Neil
CARPENTER

Yet, even with these foreseeable developments, 52 percent of the American public opposed giving more aid to Russia in the latest CNN/Time poll.

Meanwhile, southwest of Russia, there is a country immersed in both chaos and starvation. The U.S. government, with the support of the American people, has been helping that country for months now with both marines and tax dollars.

Why did we respond to one crisis and not the other?

Somalia had emotional TV pictures to galvanize U.S. action, while Russia's problems had no pictures to generate either fear or compassion in the United States.

Our sudden involvement in Somalia was driven by the pictures of pain which were sent across the Atlantic. The people squirmed and asked for something to be done, perhaps to quiet the conscience of Americans who throw away more food in a day than a Somalian eats.

Thus the new doctrine of a post-Cold War foreign policy was born. The CNN doctrine: if it moves the editors they put it on the news; if it moves the public, they send in the marines.

It is too bad for world stability and peace there were no such emotional hot buttons with the slow flames of discontent within the former Soviet Union, no easily seen reason to expend the same two billion dollars as in operation "Restore Hope."

Yet the chaos in Russia is clearly more dangerous to U.S. interests than the chaos in Somalia. Wasn't the stability of the first ever democracy in Russia worth as much of our tax dollars and our attention as Somalia?

After the explosion of ethnic hatreds the worst consequence of the end of the Cold War is that we have foreign policy being governed by an inattentive public and network news people who are more responsive to dramatic TV images then long-term American interests.

Much of the American public has taken a wrong message from the Cold War; the world's problems are more caused by the inherent fallibility of human nature than some dark plan of government.

Kudos to the UMass Minutemen

With the loss to Virginia in the second round of the NCAA tournament, the UMass basketball season came to an end. This was after the team provided this university with as much excitement as we've seen for a long time.

At the start of the season there weren't many people outside of UMass who believed our team could accomplish much of anything. The players proved all skeptics wrong by taking the A-10 season title and earning another berth in the NCAA tournament.

Along the way there were some scary moments, like Harper Williams' injury that sidelined him for a number of games. Regardless, the rest of the team stepped forward in his place to keep the team in contention.

What a long, strange trip it was, but a most memorable one at that. The season began with a near victory at Florida State, a potential Final Four squad. There was the second win in UMass history against Temple, with the third coming less than two months later. Who can ever forget the final game at the Cage? It was probably the biggest party the gymnasium ever hosted, and the nation got to watch it on ESPN.

The party continued a week later when a new generation was born at the Mullins Arena. ESPN was there again, and the team continued to impress. There were the heroics of Mike Williams and Tony Barbee, the persistent ferocity of Harper Williams, and the immense job done by "Coach-of-the-Year" Calipari. Last but not least, there was Jeff Meyer. Enough said.

Now that the season has come to a close, we can look back on the season that was and truly respect the accomplishments of this team. They have continued to bring national attention to an otherwise struggling university, and have remained a true unifying experience for students and the Amherst community alike. The cheering may be over, but the memories will remain. Guaranteed, there will be more memories to look forward to in the future.

We would like to extend a formal expression of thanks to the team for all that they have done for us in the past season. To the graduating seniors, we wish you the best of luck; to the rest of the team, we'll be back in the stands to support you next season. See you at Midnight Madness!

Vice chancellor mourns tragedy

It is with much regret that I inform you of a tragedy that occurred Saturday night in our community. Tara Hartnett, a senior psychology major, was the victim of an alleged homicide in her off-campus Sunderland apartment, apparently the result of relationship violence. A suspect, who is currently a University student, has been identified and is in custody in Northampton.

We are all shocked and grieved by Tara's death. We have been working hard since early Sunday morning to marshal our resources so we can help Tara's family, friends and other students. I have attempted to contact her family, and the Dean of Students Office has been in touch with her roommates and their families to assist them.

Relationship violence unfortunately can and does occur here and we must work together against it. Sadly, the level of violence is rising across the country — in society as a whole and on college campuses. Nonetheless, we cannot tolerate a rising level of violence on this campus. We are here for a common purpose — education. Each of us has a responsibility to contribute to a safer campus. As vice chancellor, I promise to work toward reducing the level of violence on this campus and trust I can count on you to do the same.

We have many campus resources to assist you in dealing with Tara's death or with other concerns about violent behavior. These include the staff in the residence halls, the Dean of Students Office, Everywoman's Center, the Employee Assistance Program, Mental Health, the University Police, my office and the chaplains affiliated with the University. Please do not hesitate to make use of any of these services.

I feel a deep sense of loss and shock at Tara's death as many of you will.

Thomas B. Robinson
Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs

A lesson UMass must learn: contact breeds familiarity

Well, we had some student elections. Lovely. I really didn't have a clue as to who I wanted to vote for. I could cop out and say that it didn't matter, but I'm sure that somehow or other there really were differences between the candidates. I just don't have a clue as to what those differences actually are.

They all claimed to oppose tuition increases, which is a position I'd be very hard pressed to find disagreement with. Who really wants to pay more to go here? UMass is already one of the most expensive public schools in the country. Any further increase in cost would be ridiculous, whether it's in outright tuition hikes or just some nice little fees that get tacked on to the tuition costs.

But what really got my attention was a front-page article titled "Nuñez, Lizana advocate multicultural campus" [Collegian, 8 March]. O.K. Here's the problem as I see it: the words don't really mean a whole lot.

So Lizana and Nuñez advocate a multicultural campus, good for them. But how does "advocating a multicultural campus" differentiate them from anybody else? Unless I've missed something, nobody has yet spoken out against multiculturalism. Everybody loves to talk about how much in favor of multiculturalism they are. It's a great idea. Everybody loves it. Everybody's willing to talk about it all day. Hell, to be politically correct, you have to use the term at least once in every conversation. It's the hip term as of late.

Don't get me wrong, I'm not against multiculturalism in any way at all. Trying to pretend that this university is made up of only Whites or only Blacks, Asians or whatever would not only be horribly wrong but absolutely impossible. We do all need to learn about and become familiar with the myriad of cultures that make up this campus, not to mention this planet.

Michael PAGE

But talking and talking about it, chanting the holy mantra of "multiculturalism, multiculturalism, multiculturalism, ohhhmmm" will not accomplish anything at all, except maybe to show everyone listening how liberal and progressive we are. Great, everybody talks a good game — time to actually prove it, boys and girls.

How did all these candidates propose to change things? David Nuñez said he believes that he could "provide the impetus for the unification of this campus." O.K., how? Unfortunately, the article didn't say (remember how Ross Perot said he was going to solve the nation's problems if we elected him, but never gave much in the way of details?). My question is, what did everybody plan to do to unify this campus?

I have at least one idea as to how they might do it, and I think it's terribly counter productive. I remember reading last semester how the Native American students wanted a hall for themselves, some Asian students wanted an area for themselves, etc. You know what they used to call this? Segregation, pure and simple. From what I've noticed, this campus is fairly well segregated; but it's not "the administration's" fault. As far as I can tell, we're segregated because we seem to want to be. We separate ourselves from each other, we hide out in out safe little academic/ethnic ghettos and then we get all surprised when we don't seem to know all that much about each other.

I'm going to let everybody in on a little secret that shouldn't be one at all: contact breeds familiarity. The more contact we have with people of other races, cultures, religions, sexualities, whatever, the more familiar we're going to be with them. The more familiar we are, the less we'll fear and distrust each other. The less we fear, the better we'll get along. Seems kind of simple to me.

I just feel it's time that we stop talking and start doing. Live the life that you talk about.

■ Legal Services

Services would be allowed to sue the University would be left up to the students in a referendum vote.

"Many won't like the idea of state funds to sue. I'm not saying it can't be successful, but it is going to be hard won," Rosenberg said.

Legal Services was started in 1973, said Charles DiMare, Legal Services's directing attorney. From 1975 to 1976 the University's Board of Trustees gave Legal Services limited litigation rights, but in 1980s these restrictions were ruled unconstitutional, DiMare said. During the 1980s Legal Services had 13 successful lawsuits against the University.

The last lawsuit against the University involved a controversial civil rights case involving Yvette Henry, a Black honor student in the English department. The University accused Henry of setting fires in a residence hall. She was falsely arrested, imprisoned and expelled. She was awarded $13 million out of court in 1985.

Soon afterwards the Board of Trustees took away Legal Services' power to sue the University. On August 31, 1987, DiMare said, the Board of Trustees abolished the Legal Service Office and created the Legal Services Center, which could only be used to give students advice. Students asked the Board of Trustees for a limited litigation in 1991, but it was rejected by one vote, DiMare said.

Legal Services has a total budge of $250,000, which is used to pay three attorneys and two office managers, DiMare said. But DiMare said that most of the money goes toward the lawyers' salaries. Although the three Legal Services lawyers make $30,000 to $40,000, DiMare said most attorneys make $125,000 with their experience. The two office managers are paid around $20,000, DiMare said. He added they work over 45 hours a week, counseling 200 student organizations, putting out a newsletter, teaching workshops and classes.

"Students are getting an amazing deal. The lawyers have a combination of over 47 years of post law school experience," DiMare said.

Hackman & Davidson vie for Academy nods

By JON LUPO
Collegian Staff

Editor's Note: This is the second in a six-part series highlighting the major nominees for the 1992 Academy Awards which will be presented on March 29.

The nominees for Best Actor in a Supporting Role include a long-suffering brother, a sadistic sheriff, an even more sadistic Marine colonel, a sleazy con man and . . . a surprise.

Will The Crying Game's Jaye Davidson win for his once in a lifetime performance, or will voters choose the crowd pleasing choice of Jack Nicholson in A Few Good Men, or the favorite Gene Hackman of Unforgiven?

In no other category as much as this one, does the Academy politics play a major role by splitting the young, hip voters from the older, more conservative members. And the winner may well be determined by an old-fashioned generation gap.

One can pretty much forget the sympathy nod for David Paymer, who was the one constant good thing about Mr. Saturday Night. You can also probably count out Al Pacino's nomination for Glengarry Glen Ross. Even though he was excellent in this film (much better than the overblown theatrics of Scent of A Woman, for which he is nominated for Best Actor), the Academy doesn't like him very much, and I bet only a few actually saw Glengarry Glen Ross. Besides, the dual nomination doesn't guarantee the award. Back in 1988, Sigourney Weaver lost Best Supporting Actress for Working Girl and Best Actress for Gorillas in the Mist.

The vote, then, will be split between the remaining nominees. The popular vote is with pleasing Jack Nicholson, who chewed scenery while he counted the money he made throughout A Few Good Men. Nicholson was fun to watch, but there was nothing subtle, or even especially rounded about the actor or his performance.

Gene Hackman has the inside line and a win here could signal the expected Unforgiven sweep. It's quite a performance — Hackman and the role are both complex and honest. If I had to bet money, it would be on Hackman, since everyone is saying he's going to win, Academy voters tend to go along with the crowd.

But my choice — hands down — is Jaye Davidson's superb performance

UMass student goes in giro

SIENA, Italy — After roughly two months here in Italy, I have concluded thus far that partying is a universal concept. This is probably not an earth-shattering breakthrough, but observing how folks here in Siena kick back and relax has provided some interesting observations.

One of the most preferred and common modes of passing time is doing so in giro, or literally "out and around." Likening this idea to that of bar-hopping or strolling uptown in Amherst on a Thursday night, being in giro doesn't seem too different from our idea of recreation.

As in Amherst, it is rare to see anyone really out and about until at least 10 p.m., and most Italians will have just finished dinner (and probably a feast at that) before setting out for the night.

A favorite place to start out and see who is around is a bar called Bibo. Here, a bar is quite different from our own ideal watering hole, and more comparable to a cafe. An array of pastry, sandwiches, coffee, pizza and yes, alcoholic drinks are served all day.

People frequent these charming little places to meet friends, maybe grab a bit to eat and chat over drinks. The atmosphere is very warm and social, and, it is rare for people to stay in one place for very long at night. It is thus also rare to observe, for example, people passed out under tables that they have been sitting at, nursing drink after drink all night.

At Bibo, the first thing one notices is the large crowd of (mostly) students standing or goofing off in front of the door outside, or draped over stairs directly across the narrow cobblestone street.

Walking into Bibo, it is hard not to feel as though you have just become part of a Happy Days episode with a bizarre, quasi-nuovo, European twist. From the shiny red tabletops to the checkered floor, Bibo in every way lives up to its reputation as a classic hang-out.

Clusters of people shuffle around the bar, talking, laughing and checking out everyone that walks in. Pinballs, Ninja warriors a really obnoxious version of The Munsters theme song sound out from the small arcade in back, adding to the voices and laughter from the row of crowded booths, adding to the lively atmosphere.

From Bibo people often move to another bar, a disco, a party or just on an aimless stroll around town to see and be seen.

And what a sight! Elegant, classic Sienese make a favorable impression. .

While I have noticed that jeans and a sweater are preferred valley garb and suffice for maybe 97 percent of all social activity within the 5-College area, the students here make a conscious effort to look sharp at all times, donning blazers, dress shirts, slacks, skirts and accessories (right down to the shoes) that make my own faded Levi's seem a far cry from decent.

The natives also seem to regard leisure time as time to really enjoy each other's company, where as I have noticed that at home, going out to a party often entails standing in a crowded room with a few friends and what seems like thousands of complete strangers.

Vying for the keg often takes precedence over actually talking to people, as the search for drunken bliss ensues.

The Italians, while proud of their

Animated chorale rivets audience

Chanticleer's energetic vocals win standing ovation

By JESSICA TAVERNA
Collegian Staff

Chanticleer
Bowker Auditorium
March 11

Black figures constructed themselves into an orderly line in front of a white backdrop, looking as if they were marionettes being held up by strings, straight and proper. A wave of a hand triggered a melodious harmony that bellowed throughout Bowker auditorium as if it was being amplified.

Chanticleer, a distinguished chorale group, carried a wide variety of pieces for their performance on March 11.

The show was split into two sections. The first section consisted of old classics, many of which were in Italian. The second section was a compilation of varied styles, including Irish songs, Barbershop quartets, classics such as "Send in the Clowns," and renditions of gospel.

The second part, in my opinion, elicited much more energy from the audience. They were encouraged to participate by clapping along with the gospel songs.

The first section had a much more serious tone to it. The tempo was rather slow and the lyrics were, for the most part, religious. Such selections included songs like the Ave Maria — the Hail Mary in Italian.

Chanticleer performed a segment of the Italian comedy/opera, "La Piazza Senile" — The Crazy, Senile Old Coot. The tempo got bouncier and more upbeat as the piece got more comical. They broke up into small groups and the groups played out the character roles.

The story line was about a father and his daughter. The daughter was being pursued by a young man she loved, yet was prohibited from seeing him. The father was pursuing a woman, who had a "questionable reputation," to no avail.

At one point the father attempted to serenade the woman with a song that he'd forgotten the words to and didn't have the vocal range for. The men purposely slaughtered the piece to emphasize these factors and had the audience roaring with laughter. The members of Chanticleer were very animated and enjoyable to watch.

The Irish song performed, "Down by the Sally Gardens," was composed for the group by a retired Amherst College professor. A good portion of the second half was custom written for Chanticleer.

The most comical pieces had to have been the barbershop quartets. Dipping down low while belting out "Bum, Bum, Bum" during the Cony Island Washboard Rondelle, was unexpected territory covered by such a prestigious group.

The gospel song, "Jesus Come Back," was a riveting experience for the soul. Vocal percussion, led by director Joseph Jennings, swept the entire audience into what seemed like a well-accomplished improvisational groove.

While giving the audience a sense of personal progression of the group, through short dictations between pieces, Chanticleer proved to be a professional ensemble which takes their music seriously, yet derive great pleasure from performing.

A finale that included excerpts from various Christmas carols and the wedding march ended with heads bowed and coat tails hung low during a standing ovation.

country's incredible wine, consider public drunkenness to be an overall display of bad manners and poor etiquette. The conversation always seems to take priority over the oblivion that follows a few rounds of drinks. They appear to enjoy themselves by enjoying each other.

It also seems to me that the whole concept of being in giro, looking to find whatever it is you desire, is also a great universal truth that explains well the work we all have cut out for ourselves in this life.

in The Crying Game. In the world of cinema, where the gender roles are so rigid — the men are brave and strong and the women are weak and sex objects — it was nearly revolutionary to have a role and a performance that transcended easy labels. The role could've easily been a bad joke, but Davidson brought rare depth and resonance to the most difficult character of the year.

Long after people forget Hackman in Unforgiven or Nicholson in A Few Good Men, Davidson's performance in The Crying Game will fall into the category of legendary or at the least unforgettable. Yet the Academy will probably miss this opportunity to award the truly best supporting actor of 1992.

I doubt the older members of the Academy even liked the brash, unpredictable nature of The Crying Game and will go with the safe choice: Hackman. It's a crying shame.

Tomorrow, I'll take a look at the nominees for Best Actress — probably the only sure thing. Memo to Emma Thompson: clear the space on the mantle.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): An older person begins to appreciate your friendship and generosity. You will find this person enduringly loyal. Indulge in happy memories when you need them.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): You may feel slightly out of kilter emotionally. Stick to routine chores early in the day. A financial situation improves with the arrival of the mail. A new friend displays fits of temper.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): You may be planning to do something special tonight. Your poise and charm will win you many compliments. Share expenses if dining out in a pricey restaurant. In romance, move ahead with confidence.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Be practical. Face up to the reality of an unhappy situation and take steps to remedy it. If single, you may be in for a pleasant surprise tonight. A change of scenery is favored.

LEO (July 23-Aug 22): Your powers of observation will serve you well in a puzzling work or family situation. Member of opposite sex seems overly materialistic. You learn about the future by looking at the past.

VIRGO (Aug 23-Sept 22): Others make new demands today. Influential people are willing to make concessions, but there could be strings attached. You may want to review the situation before committing yourself.

LIBRA (Sept.23-Oct.22): Look before you leap! Even your best financial guess might not bridge the chasm now. Resist the urge to merge funds. Write letters, make key appointments and think positive.

SCORPIO (Oct.23-Nov.21): Working partnership are fine, provided you avoid forcing issues. Do not antagonize someone with radical ideas. Some inside information comes your way. Use it wisely. Let a friend slide on a bad bet.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov.22-Dec.21): Unusual ideas or specialized knowledge could lead you to financial speculation. Avoid going overboard. Your work is serious yet enjoyable. Remain true to old values and routines.

CAPRICORN (Dec.22-Jan.19): You can boost your financial security by taking a complete inventory of your assets now. Work runs smoothly. You have a knack for recycling clever ideas.

AQUARIUS (Jan.20-Feb.18): New financial rewards are part of the picture. Share the wealth with your loved ones. Teamwork will provide best results. Be receptive to suggestions.

PISCES (Feb.19-March 20): Behind the scenes talks could lead an item of real value. The communication lines light up this afternoon and evening.

change. John Calipari was no longer the god he is to some students here on campus. He was just another coach on the rise in the NCAA.

Sure, the name John Calipari floats around college hoops as a hot young coach, but do you think the average person living in Syracuse, or anywhere for that matter, knows the difference between Coach Cal and a sharp-dressed man.

I sat in the stands and saw from a distance a security guard near the press area check Coach Cal's credentials before granting him admittance after the team's victory over UPenn. This man would never think of doing this if he worked in Mullins. That is just the way it is.

The players — well, let's just say that the young admirers who hounded Lou Roe, Mike Williams, and Ted Cottrell after the game in the stands were not asking for autographs because they liked UMass basketball. O.K., many fans in this area would probably beg these guys for signatures.

I stood near Derek Kellogg when three kids came up and took a picture with him. Kellogg was swarmed by kids asking for autographs before he could even reach the stands from the locker room.

These men were no longer student athletes. They were now celebrities.

When their season ended on Sunday, the Minutemen seemed drained. Gone was the glamour and the fame. The little kids didn't want their autograph. They were now Virginia fans. Well, that's the way it is. Maybe now the world will let these guys be students again. Well, until next season.

The Houston Rockets were the hottest team in the league, winning 15 games in a row before losing at Portland in overtime. Houston is still only one game ahead of San Antonio in the Midwest Division, something that is remarkable after the Spurs' skid in the opposite direction.

Seattle, which is the only team along with the Suns to have clinched a playoff spot, handed the Rockets their second consecutive loss on Sunday. The Sonics have won six in a row, and have overtaken their latest victim as the hottest team in the West.

People have been lobbying for a number of Coach of the Year candidates, but there is none more deserving than Chuck Daly. This coach has turned the Nets from a pretender to a contender. He has made New Jersey's bench almost as good as its starters by moving Chris Morris and Sam Bowie to the bench.

Chuckie Brown and Rafael Addison are giving quality minutes to the Nets, allowing Derrick Coleman to take a much-needed break.

The win in Phoenix for Daly and company could possibly be a sign of things to come for what was once the laughing stock of the league.

Across the Hudson River, the New York Knicks are finally coming together as a team. Patrick Ewing has led the attack by the Knicks to the top of the Eastern Conference, especially in Sunday's win over the Spurs. In a matchup that usually gives him problems against David Robinson, Ewing had 30 points, 12 rebounds, and four blocks in just three quarters.

New York has won nine in a row, and if they beat the Bulls out for home court advantage throughout the playoffs, watch out for a possible Nets-Knicks 7-game war.

Did you see that?

• Christian Laettner's own coach, Sidney Lowe, calling him spoiled.

• The sign two disgruntled Quaker fans were parading around the Dome on Sunday that read "Refs 54, Penn 50."

• The three coneheads that made the trip to cheer on the Minutemen. What happened to dedication?

• Miami, yes, the Heat have won 11 out of 13 games, including a 96-91 defeat of Cleveland.

• A Harold Miner poster. If you have, let me know.

• The Minutemen and Hip Hop Hooray. Enough said.

"For a flat ground institution, we (the team) are incredibly talented," MacConnell said. "I also feel that the University has supported us in a most reasonable way."

Bill Schaefer would probably agree and he has clearly shown that the support will not go unrewarded.

Women's gymnastics place third in A-10's

By ARTHUR STAPLETON
Collegian Staff

For the University of Massachusetts women's gymnastics team, its season has been filled with peaks and valleys. However, when Alfie Mitchell's team reached the Atlantic 10 Championships this past weekend, the Minutewomen looked to continue their rise to the top.

UMass was strong on all four events in the championship meet, solidifying its place in the NCAA Regionals. Mitchell said he was pleased with the team's performance, and hopes their success will continue.

"We did the best we possibly could, considering the health of our team and everyone just now becoming healthy again," said Mitchell. "We're peaking at the right time of the year, and the girls are doing it when it has to be done."

The day for UMass included a school record 47.80 on the beam, which has become the strongest event for the Minutewomen, according to Mitchell.

Freshmen Ruth Reeves (9.60), Shaheda Keels (9.50), and Leann Zavotka (9.20), junior Margaret Furtado (9.60), and seniors Abby May (9.30) and Tammy Marshall (9.80) made up the record-breaking beam team, which is once again healthy and reaching its potential.

The scores for Reeves and Keels were career bests, which may have been the theme of the day for the Minutewomen. On vault, both Marshall (9.90 — a new school record) and junior Angela Jent (9.70) topped off their A-10 season with outstanding performances, also career bests.

In the all-around competition, Marshall (39.15) fell five hundredths of a point short of the title, succumbing to junior Lajuanda Moody of West Virginia (39.20). Moody is ranked 16th in the nation in the all-around, and her score was her career best.

Overall, UMass finished behind repeat champion West Virginia (192.70) and George Washington (190.05). The Minutewomen edged out Rhode Island (188.00) for the second time this season, but will find themselves behind the WRams because of overall team average in their next meet, the NCAA Regionals, held at Ohio State University on April 3.

Penn State is seeded first in the Northeast, followed by Ohio State, New Hampshire, URI and UMass. Kent State and Pittsburgh round out the seven-team field, with Vermont as the alternate.

UMass is the fifth seed in the Region for the third consecutive year, but this season, Mitchell said he hopes that his team will accomplish what the others couldn't, and finish in second place.

"For the Regionals, you can take all the scores from the regular season and throw them all away. Now, it comes down to hitting, and who wants it more, or who is the luckiest," said Mitchell.

Notes from the Mat: The All-Championship teams for each event were announced, and Tammy Marshall found herself on all four. Angela Jent was named to the vaulting team.

Marshall had her name in the post-season awards also, being named All-Conference for all-around, vault, and floor. She was also named A-10 Senior of the Year.

Senior Abby May and the University of Massachusetts women's gymnastics team grabbed a third place at the Atlantic 10 Championships this past weekend.

Schaefer hits it big at home

By KENDRA WILLETT
Collegian Staff

Home is where the heart is.

That prophetic statement has indeed proved true for University of Massachusetts skier Bill Schaefer. After a trip away from his hometown of Charlemont, Mass., Schaefer has returned to the state to find success at UMass.

Before attending UMass, Schaefer, a sophomore, took a few years off from school to train for a chance to make the United States national team. Due to a skiing injury, Schaefer rearranged his goals and decided to compete at the college level at the University of Wyoming.

After the ski program was cut at Wyoming, Schaefer headed home to UMass with his considerable talents in tow.

Now both Schaefer and his head coach Bill MacConnell are happy that things have worked out this way.

"He is the best skier that we have on the team," MacConnell said. "Bill has done a lot for this program."

According to Schaefer, every one of his goals that he had set prior to the season have been successfully fulfilled.

"For a long time I was looking to ski against the best in the world," Schaefer said, "And even though it was a downshift coming to UMass, I realize that school in the long run is very important."

By earning All-American Honors with a sixth-place finish in the giant slalom at the NCAA National Ski Championship, Schaefer has fully seen his goals come into focus.

"This year has been a great turnaround for me," Schaefer said. "I've acheived all of my goals this season."

The event took place last week in Steamboat Springs, Colo. where Schaefer represented the University of Massachusetts in both the giant slalom and slalom races. He placed sixth in both events.

During the season there are 12 regular races in which Schaefer was undefeated in every one of them. He was then invited to the Middlebury NCAA Regionals where he competed against schools like the University of Vermont, Dartmouth, and Williams.

Placing third at Middlebury in both the giant slalom and slalom events led Schaefer to be named All East, and qualified him for the events in Steamboat.

Growing up, Schaefer was surrounded by the sport of skiing. His parents run Berkshire East, the home course for the UMass skiing program. Now UMass fever looks like it is running high in the Schaefer family. "Bill's brother Tom is looking into UMass as a school to attend and ski at," said MacConnell.

While lucky to have a accomplished talent like Schaefer, MacConnell and his team as a whole have been just as successful.

MacConnell is a professor of forestry at UMass who believes the school has done its best on the slopes. The UMass ski program is based on gender equity and consists of 14 women and 14 males. The UMass ski team have been named league champs 18 out of the 34 years MacConnell has coached.

Men's gym fourth in EIGL's

By ANDREW BRYCE
Collegian Staff

Before the University of Massachusetts men's gymnastics team entered the Eastern Collegiate Gymnastics League Championship (the EIGL's) on March 19, they were fourth in the regular season standings (4-3).

After the EIGL championships were completed, UMass (292.20) again finished fourth behind Temple (273.95), Syracuse (273.60), and Army (261.00).

"We were hoping for fourth, so we were pleased," said Johnson. "(The finish) was a tribute to how hard the team worked. We had five good events until the disaster on the high bar, but we did so well on those first five events that we were able to hold our lead over Springfield and Navy."

Jason Braud became the first UMass gymnast ever to win the floor exercise in the EIGL championships as he took first with a 9.65.

"Jay's score of 9.65 in the finals should boost his national ranking because he was counting a 9.55," said Johnson.

The win in the floor also helped Braud to become the first Minuteman to win an event at the annual championship meet in head coach Roy Johnson's 15-year tenure. Braud finished fifth on the vault with a two-score total of 17.80.

Senior co-captain Steve Christensen was the other standout for UMass as he was in first place on the pommel horse at the completion of the preliminary round (9.65) and went on to take third place in the finals (9.25).

"(Steve) was leading going into the finals," said Johnson. "He just had a little problem on his dismount, which cost him first place. It was a beautiful routine."

Christensen was coming off a record performance on the pommel, when he broke his own school record by scoring a 9.85 at the Eastern College Athletic Conference championship on March 13.

Christensen set his record in the preliminary round, and scored a 9.70 in the finals to take first place. He also finished first on the parallel bars with a 9.35.

Braud made the finals in all four events he entered at the ECAC meet. He finished second on the vault (9.00), third on the parallel bars (8.95), and sixth on the floor exercise (8.90).

Sights from the Carrier Dome to the Hardwood

SYRACUSE, N.Y. — The old saying goes, "It's tough being a small fish in a big pond."

Welcome to Notes from the Hardwood, and my travelling show, literally, around the NBA. Spring break has come and gone, and so has the Dallas Mavericks' 19-game losing streak. In the midst of this woeful season for the Mavs, many have cried mediocrity and even suggested that college teams like North Carolina, Indiana, and Michigan could pound the no-names from big D.

NOTES FROM THE HARDWOOD by Art Stapleton

Those who think this are way off. You are wrong.

Sure, the Tar Heels have pro-prospects like George Lynch, Eric Montross, and Derrick Phelps. The Wolverines have the Fab 5. Indiana has Calbert Cheaney, Alan Henderson, and Greg Graham. But what you have to realize is that Dallas is full of guys who found success in the college ranks.

The list may not contain more than one marquee name, Jimmy Jackson, or one possible All-Star, Derek Harper, but the Mavs do have players who have enough talent to play at the highest possible level.

Sean Rooks would school any of the big men in college today. He was on a top team in the NCAA's, just like any of these tourney stars. Many say that the tandem of Damon Bailey and Graham would dominate Mike Iuzzilino, the two-guard of Dallas.

Players who make the NBA are head-and-shoulders above your average college role player. For example, Jeff Lebo used to be the key for dominant Carolina teams in the mid-to-late '80s. He had one stint with the San Antonio Spurs, sitting next to the Gatorade for the beginning of the season and then disappeared.

When the Hoosiers won the title in 1987, the backcourt of Keith Smart and Steve Alford was highly praised in the world of college hoops. They could score on any guys in the country that year. Any guys in college.

This past weekend I attended the NCAA Tournament as a fan, particularly a UMass fan. The Minutemen received all of the hoopla here in Amherst that the Cowboys did in Dallas after this year's Super Bowl.

But when I got to the Dome, things started to

Remembering Tara Hartnett

Housemates hold memorial service on campus concourse

Students gather to remember Tara Hartnett on the Campus Center Concourse last night. Hartnett was killed Saturday night in her Sunderland apartment.

Almost two hundred people gathered last night on the campus center concourse to participate in a memorial service for Tara Hartnett.

Hartnett, a senior psychology major at the University of Massachusetts died last Saturday night. She was allegedly murdered by James R. Cyr, Jr. who was arraigned Monday in Greenfield District Court.

Fire fighters found Hartnett's body after they put out the flames that engulfed her Sunderland home. She had several stab wounds, but medical examiners said she died of smoke inhalation.

The memorial service was planned by Hartnett's housemates to share the memories and feelings they had. They asked that their identities not be revealed.

The five housemates all took turns sharing their warmest memories of their former roommate.

"We're here to celebrate her life, not to mourn her death," one housemate said.

All of Hartnett's roommates described her as being an outgoing and caring friend with a great sense of humor. They also agreed that her two passions in life were her daughter, Meghan and her studies.

Another housemate said the reason the service was held in the campus center was because it was Hartnett's "favorite place on campus."

"People-watching was one of Tara's favorite pastimes, we'd sit on the couches and comment on the people that passed by," one of her housemates said.

Housemates and friends also described Hartnett as being a very strong individual. They said she was a proud woman and stood up for what she believed in.

"I'm so proud that she didn't just give in and she stood

Police officer takes stand in L.A. trial

By LINDA DEUTSCH
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — The policeman who supervised the Rodney King beating roared like a lion on the witness stand Tuesday to imitate King's reaction to being shocked with an electronic stun gun. He also said he was sure King was on PCP.

Sgt. Stacey Koon told jurors he decided to fire his Taser gun at King after King threw five officers off his back.

"When I saw that move, that was 100 percent confirmation that Rodney King was on PCP," said Koon. "I believed he had thrown approximately 800 pounds of officers off his back."

Although toxicological tests showed no trace of PCP in King's system the defense maintains officers were justified in treating him as drug suspect because of his behavior. The drug can give users superhuman strength.

Koon, Officers Laurence Powell and Theodore Briseno and former Officer Timothy Wind, who are White, are accused of violating the Black motorist's federal civil rights in the March 3, 1991, videotaped beating after officers had chased his speeding car.

The officers' acquittal of most brutality charges after a state trial set off deadly riots in the city.

King, testifying earlier in the trial, said officers used racial epithets during the beating, though he later said he wasn't sure about that. Koon denied that racial slurs were used.

He said when he first saw King at the end of the chase, he thought King looked "buffed out . . . muscular," like recently released prisoners look from lifting weights.

"The look that he gave me was that he looks at you and looks right through you," he recalled. "It's a bizarre look. On the street I had seen it many times before in drug suspects."

Chancellor candidate withdraws application

By CHRISTINA ROTHWELL
Collegian Staff

One of the four finalists to replace University of Massachusetts Chancellor Richard O'Brien withdrew his candidacy yesterday in a letter to the Chair of the Chancellor Search Committee, said Ron Story, who is Interim Vice President for Academic Affairs for the five-campus University of Massachusetts system.

[UMass] is more prestigious. It is more of a national school.

Cameron Tensier
Western Herald

Diether Haenicke, who is President of Western Michigan University, said in his letter to Rina Spence that students, faculty and the governor of Michigan and other state legislators had been urging him to stay at Western Michigan University.

He especially commented on how he felt "particularly indebted" to his Board of Trustees, "which has supported and sustained me during my presidency and which wants me to stay."

"I know from talking to him previously that the campus is in the midst of finalizing some major construction projects. . . So I have the feeling this is a critical moment in the recent history of the campus," Story said.

"I am sure that is part of the reason why people urged him so strongly to stay."

Cameron Tinsier, editor in chief of the school's daily paper Western Herald, said that Haenicke is very personable and well-liked on campus, in addition to being known as having a good sense of humor.

Yet there is much controversy over the construction of a University research building, on conservation land, Tinsier said.

"I felt it would be a tremendous opportunity for him. [UMass] is more prestigious. It is more of a national school. Their budget is huge compared to ours. And it is more research-oriented," Tensier said.

"I figured that he would be interested in taking that position, but evidently he feels that he would rather stay in this community."

Applicant talks about campus multiculturalism

By TRACY MONAHAN
Collegian Staff

The search for a new chancellor is underway and one candidate, Dr. Luis Proenza, travelled from Alaska to address a forum of students, faculty and staff on the topic of multiculturalism.

"No barriers. No borders. We are one world, one people," Proenza said.

Proenza was born in Mexico and is a naturalized citizen of the United States. He is the acting vice president for academic affairs and research at the University of Alaska and is also a science advisor to the governor of Alaska.

Proenza said there are often misconceptions about the meaning of diversity and issues of race. He also said he finds it encouraging that the University is taking the time to discuss and decide what multiculturalism means to the community at large.

Proenza said he considers himself open because he has experienced much of life. He is fluent in three languages and has travelled extensively throughout the country.

He said he is not a confrontational type of leader, but instead relies on building alliances and leveraging friendships and goodwill.

Proenza said his vision of multiculturalism involves using "no exclusionary tactics."

Restructuring public school education is an important goal, Proenza said. He said the development of elementary and high school age minority students will help increase the number of minorities in professional jobs.

"Development issues are ones we need to be collectively involved in," Proenza said.

The issue of race is one that Proenza said he hopes to provide a setting and tone for the whole campus. "It's something we all have to work on together," he said.

He said King "engaged in gibberish," and didn't obey commands to get down. He described King's reaction to the Taser gun, saying, "I could see his body convulse . . . Rodney King gave out a loud grimace or yell."

Koon had not yet described the beating when court recessed. He was to resume his testimony Wednesday afternoon.

He took the stand moments after two policemen rolled around on the courtroom floor demonstrating for jurors how a suspect might grab a police officer from a lying-down position. Police Officer William Arnado and an assistant, Sgt. Michael Bushkey, tried to show why officers didn't attempt to wrestle King into compliance.

Earlier, an expert testified that Powell had "substandard training" in using a baton and could have subdued King with one blow if he had proper training.

The testimony of Edward Nowicki, who trains police officers in Milwaukee, marked a new tactic by Powell's lawyer, Michael P. Stone, to blame the Los Angeles Police Department's training for the torrent of blows officers struck at King.

One finalist for chancellor discusses vision

By CHRISTINA ROTHWELL
Collegian Staff

Dr. Luis M. Proenza, one of the four finalists for the University of Massachusetts chancellorship, discussed his vision for the campus yesterday afternoon with about 25 University students and faculty in Campus Center Room 168.

Proenza, who is acting vice president for Statewide Academic Affairs and Research at the University of Alaska, said that if he is appointed to be chancellor, he will talk to students on a day-to-day basis.

"I hope to be around campus enough . . . so you will feel comfortable in talking with me. Tell me about these problems. We have to be open to one another, if we want it to work," Proenza said.

But one student from the audience said that she has gone to many meetings to speak with administrators about the hostile environment minority students deal with on campus, but she said she still feels nothing has been accomplished.

Racial tensions are not going to be solved overnight, Proenza said, but he plans to have open forums with students in the Campus Center.

Proenza said he will be working for more minority student recruitment, but added he does not want to lower the academic standards. The University must work with more disadvantaged students in grammar and in high school, so they will have sufficient skills when applying for college.

When a student in the audience said many intelligent minority students were not able to go to college because of lack of financial aid, Proenza suggested that he must talk with admissions.

Proenza said he supports peaceful protests and condemns any acts of violence. If he hears of professors or departments harassing or discriminating students, Proenza said he will speak with the individuals.

Student Government President Jen Wood said although he was very comfortable and open in dealing with the students, he seemed very naive in his thinking that he can by-pass student government.

"He has got a lot of experience in research situations, but his experience in dealing with undergraduate concerns is not as strong," Wood said. "Especially on this campus with past events, that is very important on campus right now."

Student Government president-elect David Nunez [tilde on n] said he was looking for a stronger candidate.

"I thought he was a nice guy. I just feel he didn't have the experience in dealing with the students. I don't think he could handle the problems that could arise in the future. I don't think he is the man for the job," Nunez said. "I think he danced a lot. He seemed all theoretical without any concrete plans."

OTWA is hosting conference for students of color

By MARTIN JONES
Collegian Staff

The Office of Third World Affairs will be hosting a student leadership conference for students of color at the University of Massachusetts this Saturday. Leadership 2000 will focus on student empowerment and developing professional skills necessary to succeed in the future work force.

Nelson Acosta, director of the Office of Third World Affairs says he hopes the leadership conference will help to build bridges across the various student communities at the University.

"Some of the main goals of the conference is to empower students of color and allow them to address important issues and build coalitions," said Acosta. "I'm hoping this conference will bring people together."

The conference itinerary includes a series of workshops dealing with topics which include: The Importance of Student Activism, Directing a Meeting, The Year 2000 and You, Networking for Success, How racism divides people of color, interviewing techniques for success, The importance of communication, Entrepreneurship, Recruitment of Students of Color, and Responsibility of people of color.

Several alumni will be featured at the conference as well as numerous university staff. The keynote speaker for the conference will be Sharon Davies, assistant U.S. Attorny from New York and a UMass alumna. Davies graduated from UMass in 1984 with a degree in political science and went on to attend Columbia Law School. As a student at UMass, Davies was a prominent student activist, serving for three years on the Third World Senate Caucus and becoming the first Black woman to be elected to Senate Speaker.

Belinda McDonald, a graduate intern at the Office of Third World Affairs, worked with a number of student groups in order to gain their participation in the conference.

This Friday evening, various student leaders will be invited to a "Meeting of the Minds" leadership dinner on Campus Center's 10th floor.

"We are all looking forward to this conference," said McDonald. "The entire staff worked very hard and its success will further ensure the fulfillment of the OTWA's mission."

up for what she believed in," one housemate said.

"She was a respectful, admirable and strong woman," another housemate said. "She did what she had to do to make that baby's life happy."

One housemate said the press had gotten the wrong impression from Hartnett's classmates who described her as "quiet and shy." The housemate said, "She was loud. She was very loud, especially her laugh."

Friends and acquaintances were given a chance to speak and share their stories about Hartnett.

"I'm going to miss her smile and miss how happy she was," a friend said.

Another friend said, "I never spent a day with Tara that I didn't laugh. We got into trouble together all the time."

"There are a lot of people like me who didn't know Tara or her family, but we support her," Jawarharlal Mariappah, a graduate student in mechanical engineering, said.

During a candlelight vigil, Father Richard Bondi from the Newman Center led the group in prayer. Afterwards, the group walked to the campus pond.

"I look at an individual's talent — not what they do in their personal life," Proenza said.

He said hate crimes against gays, lesbians and bisexuals, as well as other students would not be tolerated.

"I am on the side of being human beings," Proenza said.

Proenza said he believes he is a forthright and participatory leader. He said he would be pro-active in the event of a sit-in or protest at his office.

"I might go out and sit with them," Proenza said. "Meet me halfway and I'll meet you there."

He said the criticism of the chancellor's position comes from people not knowing what the job entails.

"If you haven't met me, don't go around saying things that aren't true," Proenza said.

He said he is dedicated to building a new campus community and developing a pool of qualified employees. He said he hopes the changes he would make if he became chancellor would go beyond mere rhetoric.

"If you want to be a second-rate school, then don't invite me to be a chancellor," Proenza said.

He said he believes in the total inclusion of the human family and the respect for individual rights.

"I can't do everything for the campus," Proenza said. He said he is only one man and needs help to fight for his cause.

Unfairly fearing Islam

Muslims linked to terrorism, Prof. says

By NATHAN CRICK
Collegian Staff

A lack of true understanding by the West of the Islamic community as a whole was cited by a history professor at a lecture Tuesday afternoon.

In the third part of the Distinguished Faculty Lecture Series, Yvonne Y. Haddad spoke to a full audience at Memorial Hall about the relationship between Middle Eastern Islamic communities and the Western world.

"There is no Arabic word for 'fundamentalist,'" Haddad said, speaking of the misuse of the term in Western culture. She said the only exception she found in her travels was a Kuwaiti group, who used the term in their name because they felt "that's what America is afraid of."

Haddad discussed the issue of the how the Arab world views their place in the "New World Order," and how, in fact, they view this era as the third in a series of changes in the Arab world order, the first two being after each subsequent World War.

The third New World Order, or the Bush World Order as Haddad called it, was touched off by the disturbance of Arab strength after Desert Storm as well as the fragmentation of the Arab League.

"Islam is not a terrorist religion," Professor Haddad stated in relation to the current conflicts between the United States and the Islamic community. She said the Islamic world blamed the perceived rise of Islamic hatred in the US due to the American press, the former Republican administration, and the rise of the right wing, both secular and religious.

Haddad cited examples of this anti-

Fear of driving toward the future of a thousand more days

Eustacia Fields gazed absently ahead into the rain as her car glided along the road that glistened from her dull headlights. "I can't get it out of my mind, you know?"

Kent O'Brien remained silent in the seat beside her.

"It's like I had this shield before. I built it up when I was in high school and when I was just growing up out in 'My Blue Heaven,' and I guess it kept out all my fears and my. . . well, my fears. And I don't know where it went or if I can get it back.

"Damn it, I can deal with the all the theft and the petty little things that go on, but this thing. . . she was just a girl like me. What the hell am I going to do now? Am I supposed to carry a gun every time I break up with someone? Or go anywhere?" she cried, pressing on the gas slightly as the shadowy trees passed by.

"Jesus, Kent, I feel so small. Like everything I'm trying to be doesn't really count for anything. I could have the greatest intellect in the world, I could save the world from destruction, and what would it mean I'd be gone just the same. Dammit, I'm more than that! I'm supposed to be somebody," she paused, as the road kept coming. "I'm not just a victim, Kent. I'm not."

The hum on the engine contained the silence of the fading darkness. The dim lights from the houses made patterns in the windows. "Nobody said you were, Eustacia, and nobody said you have to be," said Kent slowly.

"Nobody says I have to be, but it doesn't mean I won't."

"You can't keep thinking like that," he said, turning towards her. "You don't know the future, and there is no reason to ponder its consequences. If you do that's a sure way to waste your life away."

"That's not what I'm saying," she said, gripping the steering wheel. "I am not afraid to live, Kent. I am not afraid to follow my dreams just because I'm scared."

Nathan
CRICK

Kent turned back to look out the passenger's side window. "So what are you saying, Eustacia?"

"I don't know," she sighed. "Its like, you try for so long to make your life the way you want it. You go to school and try like hell to succeed and find out what life is about on the way. And you realize that for all your efforts, for all the things you might have tried to build up and hold dear, that all that stuff is. . .is just nothing. It means nothing because it can't save you from a gun. It can't save you from. . ."

"Listen Eustacia, that's what it means to be alive. You are born with all the risks of this world and if you survive unscathed then fate has blessed you. There's no rhyme or reason to it, and that's the whole thrill. If you knew you were going to be here for 100 years then you wouldn't care to see the next day, because thousands more would be waiting for you that were just like it."

Eustacia drove the car in silence for a couple minutes, and eventually pulled in to Lot 33 and turned the key. The tall lamps glowered over them and the rain continued to coat the rows of cars in its glistening cover.

"I just can't see the thrill in it, Kent," she said with only the patter of drops on the roof behind her voice. "I can't see the excitement in being afraid to walk alone to my own room at night. I can't see the thrill in knowing that there's some person out there who holds my life in his hands.

"And you know, sometimes I wish I were so much stronger. That I could take that man and his knife and kill him instead. Sometimes I would trade in all my skills and all my knowledge if only I could do that. And maybe that's what really bothers me, that for all my values I treasure of forgiveness and non-violence, when I walk around alone I forget them all. Because they can't save me, Kent. They can't save me."

They both remained sitting alone in the car, and the rain outside continued to fall, tapping softly on the roof with its gentle reminder.

If terrorism was Jaws the U.S. is tasty bait

Terrorism is like a religious war — it's something we know of and hear about, but are never really touched by firsthand.

That was true, until the bombing of the World Trade Center. On Feb. 26, 1993, terrorism washed up onto America's shores like drug needles onto our beaches — it's now a tangible, valid danger we need to deal with.

The United States has always swum in international waters, but the waves we've created have never gotten us wet. Now, after years of meddling, those chartered waters have caught up to us.

E.C.
THOMAS

Being a Superpower never seemed so dismal as it did on that snowy afternoon. The twin towers loomed in the gray air, smoke bellowing out from their windows, citizens, stained with destruction, streaming out of their stairwells and body bags wheeling out from the basement.

Those from the city sat glued to their TV set for images of anyone they knew, while frantically dialing phone numbers of those who could have been in the area. Within a matter of minutes, the safety of an American citizenship became frighteningly vulnerable.

On Feb. 26 the United States entered a new realm of international relations. Our televisions will no longer reflect terrorism in just Europe and the Middle East Scattered among the images of a destroyed London and Tel Aviv will be debris from New York City, L.A., Washington, Miami and Boston. Terrorism is now a very real and present danger on our continent.

Our Middle Eastern connections were always a little shaky, and it has always been evident that many (or most) citizens from that region don't think too highly of America's "policeman" policies and arrogant attitudes. It's not surprising that these resentful feelings would eventually materialize into something more than just harsh words. But where has this inevitable act left us? Even after the dust clears and the repairs are made we will be left with a large wound that will take more than just time to heal.

The backlash that this will create could be as violent and cowardly as the actually act it self. The scariest and most plausible effect is retaliation through racism. Arab-Americans now live with a very imminent fear — justifiable racism.

I say justified only because that's exactly what an attacker (and some of the public) would think. They have a valid, although terribly misjudged, belief that their potential act is in the name of the country, not in the name of hate.

Peace talks in the Middle East are now more dynamic than ever. It seems virtually impossible not to come to the table with a new impression and an altered agenda. One might wonder if hosting these chats would improve — or increase tension.

Then of course is the question of prevention. How are we to make ourselves more secure than we already are? Even with our metal detectors, security cameras, guards, dogs, ID checks, radars, computers, etc., etc., our glass bubble has just been broken.

Does this mean more security measures? If it does, these measures might not just mean "safety" but invasion of our privacy. We will become numbered files in the computer in the name of security.

Our generation has seen the unveiling of the Iron Curtain, the fall of the Berlin Wall, the rise of American power and now we've been given a chilling dose of what comes with it.

On Feb. 26, Americans learned an important lesson in our immortality: swimming in the International Sea means the sharks can become hungry and our shores can become eroded.

The chance to pick a chancellor

Four candidates for chancellor are coming to campus this week and next. As part of each candidate's visit, the Chancellor Search Committee has scheduled a series of open forums for the University community. One of those forums is especially designed for students.

As one of the two student representatives on the search committee, I want to stress to the student community how important it is that you participate in these forums. At the conclusion of each forum, you will be given an evaluation form to provide feedback to the search committee on the candidates.

These forms, along with those filled out by other members of the community at other campus forums, will be read carefully by the committee and will weigh heavily in our decision.

This is an unprecedented opportunity for the student community to play an enormously important role in the future of our university.

Please be there.

Memories help healing process

Images.

Lasting impressions.

Permanent memories.

Experiencing the loss of a loved one means plenty of suffering. The pain and agony, a never-ending nightmare. But for many, remembering them through happy memories, is all the counseling they need.

Felice
COHEN

Through Tara Hartnett's friends, she will be remembered in many ways, none better than the other, but together, we will work to connect the pieces of her life, and create a impression for all to take and cherish and hold within themselves forever.

These are the images with which we have left. Some are harder to face than others, but are nonetheless necessary in the process of dealing with the loss.

The half dozen police lights illuminated the chilly night in crazy, erratic, confusing patterns, lighting the yard and house for an instant like some mad, silent carnival. Ticket takers in black uniforms, were splashed with blue lights. At all the entry gates were yellow plastic lines, through which we were led, literally, by the hand, past knots of watchful, quiet men, over to a figure on the ground. I could not understand for a moment, why the figure would not, could not move.

The thought of a body simply numbed me.

Images.

A mother, smiling. Her baby daughter, sitting securely on her lap, is dressed in a cute, little, pink outfit. Her cheeks, taking up most of her face, emit a giggle. Picking up her purple Barnie doll she graciously hands it to her mom, hoping for the approving nod, which she instantly receives. Gathering her baby up in her arms, she nestles her as closely to her heart as possible. Tears of happiness careen down her face onto her baby's head. The baby sighs.

Images.

A scattering of faces. Streaming down the cheeks of many, tears form puddles in laps. Arms spread open to welcome the warmth and comfort of others, while at the same time, are eager to share their support with someone else.

Gently wiping away the salty water, those present listen on. Joined together in one of the most public places on campus, the group of friends turn an open and impersonal space into an area of familiarity and closeness. Sharing memories of their close friend, only days ago alive and well, relate funny tales, hoping that everyone present walks away with a positive and lasting impression.

An kindled memory is spoken between sobs. Someone cries. A funny tale is told. Someone laughs. With each remembered image, another finds her connection. Expressions turn sporadically from sullen to smiling. Discoveries are made.

What their friend has left them, suddenly becomes clear; the strength to live on. And therefore triggering the beginning of their survival.

"A day never went by that Tara didn't make me laugh."

Minority consumers and White corporate America

In the year 2000, fully one third of America's total population will consist of people of color — Latin-Americans, Asian-Americans, Pacific-Americans, American-Indians, and African-Americans. The fastest-growing groups in this country are people of color. However, many of the leaders of America's largest corporations still frequently perceive African-Americans and other minorities as marginal to the economic development of the country. Racial and ethnic stereotypes about people of color still influence corporate marketing behavior.

The first stereotype is the attitude that the vast majority of black and Latino households are poor or low-income, and that they have relatively few resources compared to families in the White suburbs. While it's true that one-third of all African-Americans live below the poverty level, about one out of seven black households in 1990 had gross annual income of about $50,000.

Second, the average black household spends about $19,130 annually on consumer items, about 35 percent less than the $29,500 spent by the typical White household. However, when the spending of all African-American families is added together, the total comes to $270 billion per year. If African-American consumers were a separate country in terms of the goods and services they purchase, they would represent the 14th most powerful economic unit on Earth. The Latin-American consumer market is nearly as large, representing about $200 billion annually.

Latin-American, Asian-American and African-American consumers are also frequently ignored because of flawed data-collection techniques for marketing. In a typical random dialing sample done by corporations, the yield of Blacks who are contacted is usually 6 to 8 percent, well below the actual percentage of African-Americans in the general population. Blacks and Latinos living in urban areas, and especially in low-to-moderate income neighborhoods, are rarely, if ever, contacted directly. White marketing researchers, as a rule, avoid Black urban housing projects.

Dr. Manning
MARBLE

There's also the crucial factor of culture, which much of the White corporate America does not understand. It's the simple observation that people who possess different ethnic heritages, customs, and social backgrounds will also have divergent preferences, tastes and choices. We may all be Americans, but we don't all eat the same foods. A blue-collar Polish-American family in Chicago won't prepare the same meals as a middle-class Mexican-American family in the San Antonio suburbs.

In a recent issue of the, data on consumer spending patterns showed that Black families spend much more for certain items each year than Whites. In the category of food, the average Black household spends $23.84 per year for hot dogs, about 20.2 percent more than the $19.83 spent by White households. African-Americans spend 35.5 percent more than Whites for fresh fish; they allocate 43.5 percent more for bacon. African-Americans not only buy 44.7 percent more noncarbonated fruit-flavored drinks than Whites - they have distinctly different preferences in tastes. About one-thirds of all orange-flavored carbonated sodas, for instance, are consumed by Blacks.

Clothing manufacturers should observe that their profit margins are largely determined by the actions of Black consumers. The typical African-American household spends 28.2 percent more than its White counterpart for boys' sweaters, 81.8 percent more for boys' suits, sports coats and vests, 94.4 percent more for infant accessories, 128.8 percent more for boys' socks, 139.4 percent more for boys' underwear; and a whopping 194.7 percent more for boys' pants. Companies which rent household items such as washers and dryers also depend on the African-American consumer market. The Wall Street Journal noted that the average Black household spends 76 percent more than the White household for the rentals of VCRs, radios and music-related equipment; they spend 219.8 percent more than Whites to rent televisions.

Civil rights organizations should become aware of the patterns of African-American and Latin-American consumer spending. They should consider targeting White corporations which have heavy shares of minority consumer markets, but which have done little or nothing to promote minority hiring or joint ventures. A reasonable share of such profits must be ploughed back into Hispanic and Black communities and the firms hiring patterns must reflect ethnic and gender diversity. If such companies refuse to negotiate, the economic clout of minorities should be used to reward our genuine friends, and to punish our enemies. This is the strategy of "economic multiculturalism," utilizing minority economic clout to achieve our larger goals of social and economic development.

Musicians conference honors female artists

By MARTIN JONES
Collegian Staff

"Great Women of Jazz" is the theme of the 22nd Annual Black Musicians Conference, presented this week by the Fine Arts Center. Using a wide spectrum of artistic disciplines which include music, literature, visual arts and panel discussions, this year's conference will highlight the contributions that women have made to the development of jazz.

Opening Tuesday night, the conference began with "Beauty and the Beat: Ladies of Jazz," a collaboration of music and art. The exhibit featured multi-media illustrations by fashion artist Gwendolyn Black, and presented the great women of jazz as instrumentalists, vocalists and composers. A sampling of live jazz music was provided by Corinthia Cromwell and Chapter Five.

On Tuesday a panel discussion titled, "Malindy Plays As Well as Sings: Black Women Instrumentalists in Jazz" was held at 7:30 p.m. in the Cape Cod Lounge.

An awards ceremony followed in which jazz masters Dorothy Donegan and Clora Bryant were presented with the Black Musicians Conference Distinguished Achievement Award. Jazz vocalist Nnenna Freelon held a mini-concert following the ceremony.

Tonight two video presentations will be shown. On Wednesday and Friday, Tiny and Ruby - Hell Driving Women: Black Women Jazz Instrumentalists along with The International Sweetness of Rhythm will be shown from 5 p.m. to 6 p.m. on closed circuit television on the Campus Center Concourse. And on Friday, ... But Then She's Betty Carter will be shown in the Hampden Theater from 7 p.m. to 8 p.m.

Today, Jazz Vocalist Nnenna Freelon will present a master class, "On Becoming a Professional Jazz Performer" in Jeff Holmes' Jazz History class at 1:25 p.m. in the Bezanson Recital Hall. Freelon will discuss her career as a jazz musician.

This years headline event will be tomorrow night's Fine Arts Center Concert by the acclaimed jazz vocalist Betty Carter. She has performed with such jazz legends as Dizzy Gillespie, Charlie Parker, Miles Davis and Max Roach, and at age 18, joined Lionel Hampton's orchestra. Since then Betty Carter has made numerous recordings and received a number of prestigious awards. The show starts at 8 p.m. and tickets are $18, with Five College students receiving a half-price discount. Prior to the concert, Betty Carter will be holding a master class "Participation in Song" from 2 p.m. to 3 p.m. in the Fine Arts Center Auditorium.

Cape Verdean Alliance celebrates awareness week

The Cape Verdean Islands is an archepelago of ten islands off the Western Coast of Africa, 360 kilometers from Sengal, Dakar. The island was uninhabited upon discovery by Diogo Gomes and Antonio da Noli under the Portuguese crown. After the Portguese and other Europeans settled, slaves were abstracted from Guinea-Bissau. The fusion of these two races formulated a Crioulo people and culture. Over 350,000 Cape Verdeans and their descendants reside in the United States. Here, at the University, there are over 50 Cape Verdean students.

Malkes
GOMES

The Cape Verdean Student Alliance is one of the many registered student organizations on campus. The Alliance began in September of 1982, and has recently celebrated its 10th anniversary. The purpose of the organization is to maintain and promote the Cape Verdean culture here at the University and throughout the five-college area. We achieve this through cultural, historical and political events.

We are also committed to recruiting ALANA students to the University. We are here to support each other both socially and academically. Our organization has not only been open to Cape Verdeans born in the motherland of Cabo Verde or Cape Verdeans born in America, but to everyone who has shown interest in our culture. It is through our diverse group of members that we learn, and teach, each other about our rich cultural past and present. The alliance has provided an opportunity for its members to be active in the community and to maintain cultural ties, while undertaking a college career.

Throughout the years of the alliance we have been involved in recruiting, raising funds for book money for incoming freshmen, and maintaining contact with our alumni through our alumni dinner and other functions. Two summers ago we organized an educational trip to and are now instituting an internship program in Cabo Verde. We also sponsor an annual Cape Verdean Night and Conference.

On March 22 the third annual Cape Verdean Awareness Week began. At the end of the week, on March 27, we will conclude with an awareness day conference. Part of the group's goal has been to build and strengthen ties with the campus community. One way this has been done is through our yearly conference.

I challenge everyone who is committed to furthering our culture and people, or who is interested in learning about another culture to attend the eighth annual Cape Verdean Day Conference here, at UMASS, on Saturday, March 27, from 11 a.m. until 2 a.m. in the Campus Center Auditorium and conference rooms.

The conference will include workshops about race relations, Native-American and Cape Verdean interrelations, and a range of other topics, as well as cultural presentations, concluding with a dinner and dance.

I first would like to say to my Cape Verdean brothers and sisters, especially those who are in the closet, to come out and get involved with your culture. The excuse of not being able to speak Crioulo is not a good one because the meetings are held in English. Also, not knowing your history is not a good excuse for not attending. That should give one even more incentive to attend meetings and functions. By showing your support, you give strength to the other 25 active participants and to our culture as a whole.

To my many other African and African-American brothers and sisters, who have their own theories and perceptions of us. I challenge you to come and clear up your negative perceptions by learning about us before we are judged as not being African or African-American enough because of our history and culture.

I also challenge all those, especially the administration, who are constantly talking about multiculturalism to attend. During the five semesters that I ran the Cape Verdean Students Alliance, I made it a point to constantly invite administrators, I have never seen them there, but, I can hear them and the talk of multiculturalism. We have a handful of faculty, staff and many students from the ALANA community who have been very supportive and I can not forget them, and I thank them for their constant support.

I love to eat and dance just like the next person, but those things will always be there. I think attending the educational part of the program this week is important, and then we can enjoy the festivities.

Once we gain the knowledge we are then able to walk in a new light and either change our views or enhance them.

King Missile rules with intense sounds

By ADAM GOULSTON

King Missile
Pearl Street
March 22, 1993

John S. Hall is an inconsistent and perhaps tormented soul but he maintained a powerful stage presence Monday night at Pearl Street to lead the rest of King Missile in an energetic and intense set.

Given the more spacious upstairs quarters of Pearl Street, a sizeable crowd turned out for the show and were treated to a musically and personality diverse show of three markedly different bands with a common focus - their love of playing.

While not being familiar with their music, I was surprised by the inspired performance of opening act Those Melvins (not to be confused with Seattle grunge kings the Melvins.) While not looking entirely comfortable on stage, Those Melvins played with energy and good humor often sounding like a cross between They Might Be Giants and the Dead Milkmen. "The Poscur Polka" - a bouncy tribute capped a cheerful set.

The Monks of Doom are a "bunch of gentlemen from San Francisco" as described by bassist and sometimes vocalist Victor Krummenacher after a vigorous, extended version of "Flow" off their latest release Forgery. "Flow" defined the Monks' performance highlighted by the guitar/mandolin/vocal manipulation of David Immergluch.

Indeed they are talented "gentlemen." Forgery is a venture into the benefits of the instrumental. The Monks continue this venture on stage with the presence of four veteran musicians - comfortable, confident and talented.

Seeing that they are all Camper Van Beethoven alumni, one might anticipate a strong Camper influence - a little rock and roll, a little country, a little wackiness. Generally, this was not the case as the Monks blasted a set of eleven songs of a strong rock influence often more reminiscent of Rush or the Outlaws.

As the set progressed, Immergluch, plugged in his mandolin and continued to shine accessing his full array of pedals and effects liberally. "Cherry Blossom" capitalized on the unique shrill of the mandolin while briefly transferring guitar lead to a highly capable Greg Lisher.

"Turn It" was funky, harmonic, and captivating. It ended the set in full-blown style highlighted yet again by Immergluch's ample guitar skills over a thudding accompaniment leaving one insistent question. "Are Monks of Doom a serious commercial band or just an experimental venture in musicianship?" An answer is not necessary.

As the stage was prepared for King Missile, their eccentric orator John S. Hall appeared in a conservative outfit of jeans and T-shirt near the front stage speakers. Hall was not surprisingly lost in his own convoluted world as he roamed the crowd singing along as Pearl Street cranked The Buzzcocks. "I love this one!" he declared as he placed his drink on the stage to dance more freely and worship the speakers. I checked his beverage. It was Coke, just Coke.

"He's in a good mood. He'll have a good show." remarked David Denny, a UMass civil engineering senior. Denny couldn't have been more correct.

Indeed the mental institution had not suffered a recent break, this was King Missile. Their lack of physical beauty seemed to justify their loud, crunching music.

The restrained, danceable groove of the recent #1 college smash "Detachable Penis" is atypical of much of King Missile's in concert personae. "Heart is a Flower" led to moshing. Granted this is no great feat, but it proves the band is loud enough and fast enough. And goshdarnit, people liked it.

"Cheesecake Truck" off 1990s Mystical Shit is Hall's tale of the overwhelming temptations of his new delivery job. Recited and played at light speed, the band ripped off the hit in under two minutes, with Hall's whiney drone reciting every line with the greatest of ease. Quick, noisy, and borderline insane - this is King Missile.

"Jesus Was Way Cool" is an anticipated sermon in any King Missile set. Chris Xefos' keyboard set in the organ mode served as backdrop for this unique tale of love and worship which only Hall could spew. The crowd moaned as Jesus was crucified. The crowd cheered as He rose from the dead. But Hall is thankfully no Jimmy Swaggart, he requests no donations, though he would have found many willing donors.

All the eagerly awaited hits surfaced; "Detachable Penis," "Sex With You Is All I Need", and an inspired cover of the Ramones' "Rockaway Beach." It was poetry as Hall writhed on stage, in a good mood. I couldn't help but recite along with "Martin Scorcese," a wonderfully sadistic tribute to the renowned director. "He makes the best f—ing films!" I couldn't have put it more eloquently myself, John.

Unfortunately, when Hall hopped off stage to let the band prove their talents, it got ugly. Dave Rick looks like the chubby kid brother of Soundgarden's Kim Thayll but plays like he's in the high school metal band - a barrage of distortion. Xefos is a talented bassist and keyboardist but regrettably doesn't play guitar. But it's futile to judge King Missile on their musicianship.

A two song encore left the crowd grinning and satisfied. Some may consider them a novelty, but King Missile don't purport to be musical wizards. If they play your club, crank a little Buzzcocks, maybe some Ramones or Sex Pistols. Keep John S. Hall happy and you'll be greatly rewarded.

Campus Man in Canada

Maybe it's my lack of luck, or maybe mother nature just loves to "rain" on my parade but why do it twice? First of all, last year while in Chicago I got soaked in the Great Chicago Flood and then this year while hitting the hot spots of Montreal mother nature struck again.

Of course, people said that Canada would be cold, but I never though it would turn out to be minus 55 (with wind chill) and to top this baby off a heavy dumping, and I emphasis dumping, of five feet of snow. It was coming down so fast (5 inches an hour) my head looked like Medusa with a few frozen inches of wet snow.

Adam Scott
ROBERTS

I started to question the real reason Montreal has an underground city. Could it be because one can get a frost bite tan on his or her face with a moments exposure? Hey, it's probably more than some of you folk got down in Tornado struck Florida!

Anyhow, not speaking French wasn't a problem. I started to create my own version of what I thought was French. My friend and I were going to Olympic Park, home of the 1976 Olympics, and I needed to find a metro stop called Pie IX. So when trying to figure out what side of the track I needed to be on I asked "Could you tell me which way to PieDeu (with an imposed accent)?" These people looked at me as if I was crazy. Then, I was corrected. Thank god— you'd think they could understand a little English.

Well whether I was going to Berri-UQAM, what I called Berryquam, or trying to get to Rue Guy Laruche, which really was Guarachmente or something, I managed just fine.

All right, so my friend and I did get locked in at the Metro at 1 in the morning. I'll admit it. The Metroman wouldn't let us out. So I yelled in English at another persisant native arguing with this man "What are you saying in English?" Well low and behold we were released. I felt like one of the thousands of balloons being released into the sky at the Super Bowl's half time show.

The best part of my trip was going to Hard Rock Cafe; I refuse to do tourist-ee things? My friends and I had a blast. I personally, was having a party of my own.

I told the waitress to Bonjour — I mean Merci to keep those Long Island Ice Teas (aka's L.I.T.s) coming. I was rocked. We then asked for rolls because we wanted a munchy and she brought us, as she called them, "Tootsies" which were small tootsie rolls; gee, this was a new experience. It must have been a Canadian thing.

Also at the H.R.C. I was thrilled to see Madonna's shoes from her Like A Virgin Tour. Like, they couldn't get her to donate her chastity belt or something. Anyhow, being the Madonna fan that I am (since 1980) I lunged forward to take a photo of her shoes. Now, that I think about it I hope I didn't interrupt that young couple that was sitting right below it.

It gets better. I was drunk and feeling really good. I thought it would be a nice souvenir to take the whole bucket of H.R.C. matches and the St. Patrick's day balloons which my new friend Sara grabbed onto (we'll get to her later). At this point Sara started to steal the green shamrock from the door of the entrance. Rather than being escorted out of the building we were physically removed from the premises. And I thought New Yorkers had an attitude problem. Think again.

It was now time to parade into the Ritz. Hey, if they had a problem with it, which they didn't, I'd do all the talking. Those Ritz employees never know who's child you may be. Can we say minister of Saskasatwan! I can.

Here's the scoop on Sara. You know when someone tells you to give their friend or relative a call and you're like "Yeah right!" Well, by all means reach out and touch someone. Sara is my friend's sister and she goes to McGill. This girl was so full of life and made my trip that much more enjoyable, as for romance, nothing's happened yet — but things are definitely open for discussion.

And if anything does happen I'm not going to go sprawl it across the pages of this or any other paper. Point is— call that someone and make a new friend. You'll definitely be happy you did.

Shopping. The stores in Montreal cater to men instead of women. The people of Montreal are very en vogue. They wear a new hip bell bottom type pants and everyone looks like a model from some European magazine. I observed that no one, not even children, wear sneakers.

So, I joined the crowds at the shoe store looking for some hip shoes. The salesman told me that the shoes cost $495 and I said "I don't care, I'm not buying them anyway. Get me a size 12."

This man was not pleased with my bluntness especially that he now knew I wasn't buying the shoes. I just wanted to try 'em on. The sneaky bastard told me he didn't have my size and I told him "You see that wall. Pick out a shoe—I don't care what style and find me a size 12!" Unfortunate for her, my friend Melissa had to be there to witness this. Sorry!

Anyhow, Montreal is a definite must see and do kind of city. First, I'd recommend that you learn some French (and I'm not talking about the kind you learned in junior high); bring a charge card, you'll get a better exchange rate.

As for the sexual scene: condoms are everywhere! Montreal: The Safe City. And pick yourself up a copy of Montreal's Mirror, it will be your guide to everything. And remember it's Merci not Bonjour. Finally, Hard Rock's located on Rue Cresant. Shalom! Oops, wrong country. Au revoir!

Emma Thompson leads race for Best Actress

By JON LUPO
Collegian Staff

Editor's Note: This is the third in a six-part series highlighting the major nominees for the 1992 Academy Awards which will be presented on March 29.

The only sure thing at the Academy Awards this year may be the race for Best Actress. With the Academy pulling straws trying to fill the nomination slots (1992 was a particularly dim year for women in the movies), it has pretty much cleared the way for British actress Emma Thompson to win for her marvelous performance in Howards End.

The other nominees include Michelle Pfieffer for the almost embarrassingly reverent Love Field (bad hair, bad accent), Catherine Deneuve for the little-seen Indochine, Susan Sarandon for her courageous mother in Lorenzo's Oil and Mary McDonnell for Passion Fish.

Thompson, truly one of our generation's great actresses, has been sweeping all the critics' awards and Sunday capped it off with a Best Actress win at the British Academy of Film and Television Awards.

Thompson was the stable center in the whirling world of Howards End, creating a truly original character in what could've been just another stuffed costume drama (see Meryl Streep in Out of Africa). Thompson has a way of acting with her eyes that is simply stunning; adding another dimension to one of the most perfect performances in recent memory.

As for the other nominees, the only potential threat — and it's an outside one — is Susan Sarandon. If she wins, it'll be more for her extensive body of work (Atlantic City, Thelma & Louise) and not for her solid work in Oil. She's deserving, but Thompson's performance outshined everyone this year.

Michelle Pfieffer: not this early in your career and certainly not for Love Field. Deserved to win for Dangerous Liaisons in the Supporting category, but her role as the Texas housewife en route to Kennedy's funeral was adequate and nothing more.

Indochine is still stuck in art house limbo, and Catherine Deneuve hasn't been around much lately, so count her out. Mary McDonnell was very good in Passion Fish (a lot better than she was in the way overrated Dances With Wolves), but her lack of film credits puts her at a disadvantage.

Fans of Thompson (a growing group, indeed) can see her in husband Kenneth Branagh's production of Much Ado About Nothing this summer with Denzel Washington and Michael Keaton in the Shakespeare romantic comedy. She's also reteaming with the Howards End creative team as well as co-star Anthony Hopkins in The Remains of the Day.

Tomorrow, the race for Best Actor will be examined. Will the notorious Malcolm X snub extend to the best performance of 1992? Let's hope not.

Islamic sentiment by quoting Ronald Reagan who said he feared the Muslim belief that "one can only go to heaven if they kill a Christian or a Jew." Haddad also made references to Pat Robertson, who recently made the statement that "Muslims are invading us."

She also brought up the subject of hypocrisy in American foreign policy. Haddad spoke of the Arab world's anger at the United States' declarations that they support democracies and human rights, yet are allies with autocratic countries such as Egypt, Kuwait and Saudi Arabia, the latter being the only Arab nation where women are still not allowed to drive.

In response to a closing question about the recent Trade Center bombing, she said "If a couple of Catholics were accused of terrorism, would they go after the Archbishop?"

Professor Haddad, a native of Syria, received her bachelor's degree from Beirut College of Women in Lebanon. Later she went on to earn a master's degree from Boston University and the University of Wisconsin, as well as a Ph.D. from Hartford Seminary. She has also written several books and articles, and works as a consultant for CBS News and other networks.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Your first consideration today should be your physical well being. If under the weather, you cannot give your best. Self improvement activities hold special appeal.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Your confidence returns, along with your drive to succeed. Heed an urge to create something completely new. When your friends see you in a new light, they will appreciate you all the more.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): If you shut yourself off from the world today, you could miss out on some wonderful opportunities. Be more outgoing. Helping the underprivileged brings you a sense of fulfillment.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Today is a perfect time to shake hands and sign on the bottom line. To keep your energy level high, eat right; do not try to run around all day on an empty stomach.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): The terrain could be a bit rocky in romance. Easy does it now. Curb an urge to insist on having your own way. Listen instead of preaching to a troubled teenager.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): You know exactly what family members and friends want to hear. Talk up a new project today - you are a master at influencing others.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Fortunately, you possess the confidence and clout to sway people to your way of thinking now. Breath easier now that you have begun to pay off your debts. Provide much-needed support to a sibling.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Try out an idea on an ally who knows where you are coming from. Eliminate behavior patterns that cause anxiety. The bright lights beckon tonight.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Curb a tendency to clash with your kin; neither you nor they need that now. Friends brighten your day. Focus on activities you can share. Starting changes are on the romantic horizon!

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): An excellent day for handling real estate transactions. An influential person wants to use his clout to advance your cause. You can count on being lucky in love, too.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Seek ways to stretch your time and money. Recycling old ideas will lead to new profits. Welcome suggestions offered by inexperienced colleagues.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Expenditures may be up. Avoid buying non-essentials. You will accomplish more at work if you avoid rushing around. Thoroughness is key to greater business success.

The Senator's best shot would appear to be the April 3rd game against Hartford. Coach Rick Bowness must be licking his chops at a chance to play the Ducks at the Pond next year.

Any doubts about Mario Lemieux were erased as he scored four goals in the Penguins 9-3 drubbing of the Philadelphia Flyers. Lemieux now has 50 goals on the season despite missing 23 games. Eric Lindros also scored his 32nd goal, in the game, continuing his resurgence.

UMass will enter Hockey East in 1994

By MICHAEL MORRISSEY
Collegian Staff

The Hockey East conference is taking on a decidedly western flavor in 1994.

The University of Massachusetts will join Hockey East for a full schedule in the 1994-95 season, it was announced at a press conference Tuesday by commissioner Stuart P. Haskell, Jr. at the William D. Mullins Memorial Center.

UMass will be the only team west of Interstate 495 in the conference. Hockey East is comprised of Boston College, Boston University, Merrimack College, the University of New Hampshire, the University of Maine, UMass-Lowell, Northeastern University and Providence College.

The Minutemen will play an abbreviated schedule in the 1993-94 season, mainly against Division II and III opponents. Assistant athletic director Al Rufe said 22 games were already scheduled, including two against Merrimack. Where league schedules permit, other Hockey East teams will also play the Minutemen.

At Tuesday's press conference home and away UMass jerseys, designed by the CCM sportswear company, were unveiled. Eastern Massachusetts hockey luminaries such as Haskell and former Boston College head coach Len Ceglarski were in attendance.

Chancellor Richard O'Brien and athletic director Bob Marcum promised the program will be competitive.

"We've seen what basketball can do for the national recognition of our institution, and we expect the same from hockey," said O'Brien. "[The timetable] wasn't the original scheme, but this gives us a new sense of committment. We've made a first-rate investment."

"It appears very ambitious, but at the same time we should expedite the process," Marcum said. "We don't think a great facility should get any older."

Although the university has yet to hire a coaching staff, Marcum said the process is drawing to a close.

"We're working hard at finding a coach. As an athletic department, we've tried to approach this in a quiet way... Some of the candidates are still in competition. By the 1st week of April, we should have a head coach."

UMass won the ECAC Division II championship in 1972, but dropped hockey after the 1978-79 season due to the difficulty of obtaining ice time at nearby Amherst College's Orr Rink and at Greenfield.

The Mullins Center, which opened last February, houses two Olympic-sized rinks. It will seat 8,200 for hockey, which will make it the largest arena facility for ice hockey within Hockey East. The nearest in size is BC's Kelley Rink of Conte Forum, which houses 7,884.

Baseball breaks even in Florida

Minutemen win four, lose four in southern road trip

By ARTHUR STAPLETON
and MICHAEL MORRISSEY

For the first time in recent memory, the University of Massachusetts baseball team came home from Florida with a .500 record. But as always, head coach Mike Stone said his team could have been even more successful.

"We played a much tougher schedule last year," said Stone of his 2-7 opening in 1992. "We should've beaten Akron Saturday night. We were up 6-3 in the ninth, and up one run in the tenth, and we lost."

Despite losing pitchers Ron Villone and Rich Graham to the Seattle Mariners, this year's team hopes to go farther than a semifinal loss in the Atlantic 10 tournament. Judging from the Florida trip, improvement is a distinct possibility.

The Minutemen came back from Florida with four wins in eight games, including a 5-4 win over A-10 rival West Virginia.

UMass opened the trip with a 15-4 drubbing of Florida Tech. The Minutemen pounded out 14 hits en route to ace right-hander Jeff Toothaker's first win of the season. Toothaker combined with the bullpen to scatter 13 hits.

The team made it two in a row behind senior right-hander Jim Telgheder, 6-2 over Allentown (PA). The Minuteman pitching staff allowed five hits in the victory, while the offense continued its barrage on the opposition, collecting 14 hits in the win.

"In Florida, we played more like we haven't played inside for eight weeks," said Stone. "We normally come out very disoriented, and this year it wasn't as bad. In fact, it was kind of good in many ways."

The Minutemen proceeded to drop three of their next four after the 2-0 start. Back-to-back losses to Rollins, 6-3, and Stetson, 9-4, highlighted the chinks in UMass' armor. In the two defeats, the opponents tallied 17 hits combined with six UMass errors.

Toothaker came back strong in his second outing of the season, squeezing out an 8-6 win over Pace. He came back on five days rest to pitch eight innings, and Pace could only muster nine hits.

UMass dropped its sixth game of the season on March 18 at Lakeland, home of the Detroit Tigers' spring training facility. South Alabama defeated the Minutemen 14-5, as Telgheder was knocked out in the fifth inning. South Alabama knocked out 16 hits, compared with nine by the Minutemen.

The next day, with many students out in the Daytona sun, the team was out on a Daytona baseball diamond, winning a hard-fought battle against A-10 foe West Virginia, 5-4. Freshman David Dart pitched two innings and collected the win while Greg Spitale of the Mountaineers was tagged with the loss.

UMass had a chance to stay over the .500 level with a win over Akron in the Florida finale, but blew leads in the ninth and tenth innings. Toothaker was the hard-luck loser as UMass was unable to hold the 6-3 and 8-7 leads.

Despite the 10-day trip, the Minutemen had many loose ends to tie up. Stone said he still has not picked a catcher, although Andy Pelis and Jeff January "both receive the ball well." January is the incumbent and hit .296 in Florida, but Pelis is fully recovered from the broken hand he sustained last year.

Stone said the starting rotation is very shaky at this point. After Toothaker, the rest of the staff will be fighting it out for starts. A back injury to Scott Meaney, last year's No. 3 starter, has clouded the picture even more. Peter Ferrari, who had a 1.80 earned run average after Florida, also has an injury, according to Stone.

"We need our pitchers to compete, we have no dominating pitcher who could come in and pitch a shutout, no overpowering pitcher," Stone said, alluding to Villone. "Toothaker's more of a control pitcher.

"We'll have pitching by committee. Whoever is well rested and pitching well we'll throw in there."

Although the team lost Villone, Graham, John Carelli and Jay Dodig, Stone said he hopes the freshman can fill the holes.

"I hope it's not a rebuilding year, I think we could be pretty good," Stone said. "Mark Pileski (.414 on the trip) started seven games at second base, and he's done well offensively and defensively.

"Nelson Ubaldo is our center fielder, and he hit a couple of home runs and covered a lot of ground for us in the field. For pitchers, David Dart and Jay Murphy (redshirt sophomore) were two young guys who did good."

Back in the cold, snowy Northeast, the team's next few games appear to be wiped out. The Minutemen were supposed to travel to UConn yesterday and host Providence Thursday, but both games have been snowed out. Even this weekend's A-10 matchup with St. Joseph's appears to be in jeopardy. Stone said he hopes his players are getting cabin fever.

"I hope they're getting itchy and I hope they play better when they come out. I think it could be positive."

The NHL playoff races get tight

Welcome to crunch time! With only three weeks remaining in the regular season, some exciting playoff races have emerged as teams jockey for playoff spots.

Adams Division:

Due to the dismal seasons of the Whalers and Senators, the Canadians, Nordiques, Bruins, and Sabres have all clinched playoff spots. Montreal, who once seemed assured of the Adams regular season crown, has slumped lately and is feeling the heat of the surging Bruins and Canadians. Buffalo will likely remain in the fourth spot.

Patrick Division:

This is once again proving to be the NHL's toughest division. Although Pittsburgh is running away with first, only five points separate second-place Washington and fifth-place New Jersey. With four teams battling for the three remaining playoff spots, the Patrick division will be exciting to watch.

The Capitals, currently in second place, face the toughest schedule facing the Canadians twice as well as the first place Penguins. The Islanders have the easiest road with no remaining games against the Pens, and three games against lesser opponents like Hartford, San Jose and Philly. With nine games remaining between the combatants, the dogfight for the final playoff spots likely won't be decided until the final games of the season.

Norris Division:

This race features the NHL's highest flying offense in the Detroit Red Wings and the league's stingiest defense in the Chicago Blackhawks. The retooled Maple Leafs will also figure into the picture. The St. Louis Blues and the Minnesota North (No Stars) Stars will battle it out for the final spot.

Smythe Division:

With the Edmonton Oilers fading fast, the Smythe Division's playoff spots should be wrapped up shortly. The first-place Canucks and the rejuvenated Calgary Flames will battle for the first, while the Kings and Jets compete for the third spot

Around the NHL:

I'm keeping my fingers crossed, but the Cam Neely vs. Ulf Samuelsson confrontation may finally happen this Saturday. Neely returned (again) to action last Tuesday against New Jersy after swelling in his knee had put him back on the shelf.

If Neely remains healthy through this weekend and Samuelsson doesn't concoct one of his legendary "mystery ailments," the long awaited confrontation will finally occur.

With only six games remaining the Ottawa Senators will likely become the first team in league history to go through an entire season without a win or a tie on the road. The Senators, 0-35-0 away from Canada's capital city, have been as productive as our senators in Congress.

SYRACUSE, N.Y. — Now that my name's in consideration for the chancellor's position, this space will take on added meaning as I lobby for the job.

Free beer for everyone.

• You know you're in Syracuse if the girl beside you in the bar is carrying a cellular phone. We figured because it was Tournament time she wanted access to her bookie.

"No, we might be having a surprise sorority party," she said.

"Well, do you think I could borrow it to call Coach Cal and tell him the pitchers are pretty cheap down here?"

"What?"

• There's brackets everywhere, and my theory is to fill it in as we go along. It's easier than erasing.

• Cal was very somber and thoroughly drained after the loss on Sunday, and expectedly so. He was also very candid in taking blame for the loss. "They came to play and we did not. We'll have to take a look at how we prepared for this game," he said.

Then, when someone suggested it might be better that the Minutemen not have to face a surging Cincinnati team, Cal perked up.

"No, we wanted them again," he said, referring to UMass' loss earlier this year.

The best Cal-ism of the weekend was when he described how he thought Sunday's game would be played.

"It's going to be 'moosh-face' basketball," he said.

Moosh-face? Wasn't that a cartoon character from the '70s?

• Let's hope Cal's coaching staff stays intact, but don't count on it.

• People in this land of snow didn't seem to have the greatest sense of humor when we asked who the Orangemen were playing in the first round of the Tournament. What's the matter? Lake effect get you down? Sore sports.

• Mike Williams' return on Friday was one of the nicest stories of the UMass season. Williams was just so happy to be playing again and his performance was merely gravy. He's only going to get better.

• Simply put, Tony Barbee is a class act.

• We were hoping the Carrier Dome could switch to another game during any of the numerous blowouts. But the games played on, with very little suspense.

• Sam Crawford was a flashy point guard, but don't forget that to go along with his 16 assists on Friday, he also had nine turnovers.

• I'd walk a mile for a Dome Dog.

• We made sure to make a toast to Harper in 44's, just for good measure.

• A reader who has been with us from the very beginning, way back in 1933, submitted the winning entry in the Name My Niece/Nephew Contest. We needed a marketable sports name, that rhymed with Dennis. Herb from the physical plant, and a fine wine connoisseur to boot, offered Ennis T. Dennis. What's the T stand for Herb-o?

"Tennis, Dave, tennis."

A night of Montague merriment awaits Herb.

• ESPN is usually the channel we turn to for an escape from the day's morbid news. Monday night's report of a fatal accident involving players on the Cleveland Indians put things in perspective.

• Now I'm being targeted for using the same, poor hockey joke for numerous columns in a row. The NHL has been replaying the same games for 35 years, so I've got another 34 to go on with my line about everyone making the playoffs. Deal

Yeltsin, parliament no closer to accord

By SERGEI SHARGORODSKY
Associated Press

MOSCOW — Russia veered between confrontation and compromise Wednesday, and President Boris Yeltsin and his legislative opponents ended up no closer to resolving their power struggle.

The fierce arguments in Moscow reverberated across Russia. Cossacks offered to form a presidential guard to defend Yeltsin and declared self-rule in their southern Don region. Siberian coal miners threatened a strike in support of the president.

Hopes for a settlement dwindled after Yeltsin's chief rival, parliament speaker Ruslan Khasbulatov, presented "rude ultimatums" for concessions during talks with the president, said Yeltsin spokesman Vyacheslav Kostikov.

"The president responded with a resolute and firm rejection," Kostikov said, according to the Interfax independent news agency.

Khasbulatov later indicated he still hoped for a compromise.

Also Wednesday, President Clinton also expressed hope for a negotiated solution, saying "It is very much in our interest to keep Russia a democracy." He met with Russian Foreign minister Andrei Kozyrev to discuss U.S. aid and the planned Clinton-Yeltsin summit in Vancouver on April 3-4.

The struggle between Yeltsin and the Communist-dominated Congress of People's Deputies had been stewing for months over the question of whether the executive or legislative branch should have more power.

The situation boiled over after Yeltsin declared emergency rule on Saturday and called for an April 25 referendum on whether a new form of parliament should be established.

Russia's Constitutional Court on Tuesday ruled both those actions violated the constitution, although it approved Yeltsin's request for a national vote of confidence on him.

Wednesday began with the Supreme Soviet voting to convene an emergency session of the Congress on Friday to consider removing Yeltsin for violating the constitution.

During the session, Yeltsin's office released a text of his decree that omitted any reference to the "special order" of rule mentioned when he announced the decree on television.

It was not clear whether Yeltsin had revised the decree to meet the court demands, or whether he had exaggerated its

Awareness Week to commence

Public displays of gay affection scheduled for today

By MELANIE DESILVA

Walking through campus on any day of the year, couples in love, hold hands, hug, touch, kiss, and walk arm and arm.

Yet, these displays of love have a distinctive characteristic. They are predominately heterosexual.

Unfortunately, for gays, lesbians and bisexuals in American society and on the UMass campus, revealing the slightest feelings of love toward same sex partners can be dangerous.

"Heterosexual couples never have to worry about the fear of bodily harm for holding hands or for giving each other a hug, or for walking arm and arm through the Campus Center. That's something that GLB people could get beaten up for," said Ali Woolwich, coordinator for Gay Lesbian and Bisexual Awareness Week.

Next week, however, for 20 minutes, 40 to 60 gay, lesbian and bisexual students plan to hug, kiss and hold hands without the threat of physical attack.

At 11:45 a.m. on Monday, March 29 on the Student Union Steps Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Awareness Week will commence with a public display of affection.

Organizers said they hope the event will promote tolerance among heterosexuals who believe affection between same sex partners is unnatural or disgusting.

"The purpose of the public display of affection or the hug in is two-fold. The first is to create a temporary, encouraging space that GLB people see on campus. To encourage them to come out and stay out," said Ali Woolwich, the Lesbian, Bisexual, Gay Alliance's liaison to the Program for Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Concerns.

"The second is to show heterosexual people who may have never seen same gender couples publicly show affection for each other what that looks like and that it's not scary, or threatening. It's just everyday life."

Heterosexual students who feel uneasy or even repulsed by the event are being asked to think about why they feel that way, and to recognize the socialization which shapes their attitudes towards sexuality and gender.

"We're living in a society — which this campus is not exempt from — that suffers from a severe case of homophobia and heterosexism," Woolwich said.

"If a demonstration where people show affection for each other in public seems odd, it's only because there's such a lack of visibility and safety for public displays of affection in every day life for GLB people," she said.

Woolwich stressed that people walking by, or gay students who attend but do not want to participate will not be "jumped." No one will be touched without consent.

"The Public Display of Affection is a celebration of our culture and our history. We're taking time out on Monday to publicly express as a group what society wants us to hide," concluded Wendy Mataya, graduate student and media coordinator for the Program for GLB Concerns.

Conference draws writers of acclaim

The journalism department and various other groups on campus are sponsoring the 1993 Art of Nonfiction Writer's Conference to be held today and tomorrow in Memorial Hall.

A number of well-known journalists and writers will be speaking at the conference, including Pulitizer Prize-winning reporter Henry Bissinger, Rolling Stone reporter William Greider and author Nick Lemann.

Bissinger, the winner of the Pulitzer Prize for investigative reporting in 1987, will attend the conference. Bissinger wrote the book Friday Night Lights about racism and football in Texas. He is currently at work on a book about the mayor of Philadelphia.

Novelist Ted Conover will also be at the conference. He graduated from Amherst College in 1981 and has published books on illegal aliens and railroad hoboes. He is working on an article about AIDS in Africa for the New Yorker.

The winner of the National Association of Black Journalists Award for Commentary, Patrice Gaines, will share her comments on news reporting for The Washington Post. Gaines is also a

Chancellor candidate's energy said impressive

By CHRISTINA ROTHWELL

Dr. David K. Scott, one of the three finalists for the University of Massachusetts chancellorship, will speak with students and faculty today at two open forums.

Scott, who was Michigan State's provost and vice president for academic affairs from 1986 to 1992, will speak on multiculturalism in the Campus Center room 101 from 9:15 to 10:30 a.m. He will address student issues from 3:30 to 5 p.m. in the Cape Cod Lounge.

Audience members may fill out forms to help guide the Search Committee in their choice for chancellor.

"It is important that all of the different constituencies of the campus be present with these forums and meetings to be able to assess him and to express their concerns and thoughts regarding every candidate," said University veterinary and animal science professor Abél Ponce de Leon, a member of the Chancellor Search Committee. "They will assist members of the search committee tremendously in deciding one candidate over the other. At this moment all of the candidates are good individuals."

His philosophy and energy was what Ponce de Leon said attracted him to Scott. Ponce de Leon added that Scott's experience with multicultural and diversity issues, impressed him.

"He is an advocate for teaching and multicultural issues," Ponce de Leon said. "Where he came from he was very active in creating diversity in the campus as well."

Erin Burke, campus editor for the Michigan State News, said Scott also made the final stages for the University of Missouri's chancellorship last summer. Although Burke said he was very involved in the campus, she said, "He was not a people person."

"We were all very disappointed when we heard that he was not chosen as interim president. He is also on a very short list for our next president," Burke said. "He knew more about the university than the president did."

UMass doctoral student Marc Kenen, said Scott's vision for the campus impressed him.

Scott has been on sabbatical at Oxford University in England. In 1992 Scott was awarded the John A. Hannah Distinguished Professor in Learning, Science and Society award. After graduating with honors in physics from Edinburgh University, he then went on for his nuclear physics doctorate at Oxford University.

"I look forward to what the campus thinks about him in the next couple of days. He is from a school that has got a strong research tradition," said Student Trustee Kevin Newnan, a Search Committee member. "And he is somebody whose believes that research mission of the University can be enhanced in a way that will benefit undergraduate education and the University community as a whole."

'Hiroshima' author dies at 78

KEY WEST, Fla. (AP) — Pulitzer prize winning author John Hersey, a World War II correspondent who captures the horrors of the world's first atomic bomb attack in his book "Hiroshima," died today. He was 78.

Hersey won the Pulitzer Prize for fiction in 1945 for "A Bell For Adano," his third book. It was followed by his celebrated account of the bombing of the Japanese city of Hiroshima on Aug. 6, 1945.

He was felled by a stroke a year ago, and also suffered from cancer of the colon and liver, said Barbara Hersey, his wife of 35 years. His family was at his side when he died just before 3 a.m., she said.

His more than 20 books also include "The Wall" (1950), "A Single Pebble" (1956), "The War Lover" (1959), "The Child Buyer" (1960), "The Algiers Motel Incident" (1968) and "Aspects of the Presidency" (1980).

His last book, "Antonietta," published in 1991, tells the story of a Stradivarius violin, and Hersey inserted himself as a character.

"A Bell For Adano" told of the impact of American soldiers occupying an Italian village. It was written after he returned to the United States at the end of a stint covering the war in Africa and Italy.

It was made into a film of the same name.

"Hiroshima" was originally written for The New Yorker, which devoted an entire issue to it in 1946. It came out in book form shortly thereafter.

"John Hersey's writing about the moral problems in World War II was of the highest quality," said author James Michener. "Those of us who participated in that war at any level recognize the gravity of what he was attempting."

Judith Jones, his editor at Alfred A. Knopf for the past 15 years, said Hersey not only wrote, but fought for the rights of all authors and was active until the end.

"He was extraordinarily versatile, a wonderful story written, a wonderful journalist," she said. "He brought some of that journalistic ability to his novels."

Clean needle bill faces battle

By MARTIN FINUCANE
Associated Press

BOSTON — Programs providing drug addicts with clean hypodermic needles would cut the spread of AIDS in Massachusetts, activists said Tuesday. But critics said they were worried about increased drug abuse.

The Legislature's Health Care Committee heard testimony on dozens of AIDS related bills before about 100 people at a Statehouse auditorium.

"I'm wondering just how far we're going to go in looking the other way with drug dealing and drug abuse," House Minority Leader Peter Forman, R-Plymouth, said. "The clear message in this program is that the police should stay clear, that the police have got to look the other way."

Larry Kessler, executive director of the AIDS Action Committee, said an estimated 40,000 people in the state inject drugs and 40 percent, or 16,000, are infected with HIV, the virus that causes AIDS. He said the proportion of those infected had increased from 12 percent in 1985.

Kessler said the answer was to provide drug treatment and needle exchange programs.

"From New York to Tacoma, New Haven to Hawaii, it has been proven time and time again that needle exchange programs work. How many more times do we have to prove it?" he said.

But Forman said "the reality of the life of addicts" was that addicts would continue to share needles even if clean ones were available.

Lea cox, President of the Hanover based Concerned Citizens for Drug Prevention Inc., said, "There are two serious problems in our country: AIDS and use of illegal drugs. We cannot afford to sacrifice one for the other - John Belushi is just as dead as Rock Hudson."

Kessler also said activists were opposed to mandatory AIDS tests and partner notification, believing such measures would discourage people from coming forward voluntarily for testing.

"Strong nationwide evidence supports that only when people are assured that information regarding their HIV status is confidential, and when access to the program is non-coercive, will individuals voluntarily come forward to seek testing, counseling and notification services," he said.

Senate awards funds for Cape Verdean week

By ROBERT FERREIRA
Collegian Staff

After much debate, the Student Senate last night gave funds to the Cape Verdean Alliance to help defray costs incurred through Cape Verdean Awareness Week activities. The Senate gave them a $300 grant along with a $500 loan.

In a late petition submitted to the Senate, the Cape Verdean Alliance requested $1,000 to help support their awareness week.

Debate ensued after it was discovered that the student government's reserves totalled at $2345.

Passing the Cape Verdean Alliance's request would greatly reduce the reserves, making it difficult for the Senate to accommodate future request made by other groups.

The Senate moved to amend the proposal and reduce the amount requested to $300. Last month the Finance Committee set guidelines making $400 the maximum amount that could be awarded to a group.

Treasurer Emily Elizabeth Rose urged the Senate to give the alliance the $300 grant in conjunction with a loan.

"This event is in dire need of funding," she said. "It might not go on."

Opposing Rose was Senator Jeff Turco who argued that the petition was late and therefore against Senate policy.

"We have rules if you want money," he said. "We can't skirt them every time an emotional situation comes up. We would be doing a disservice to other [Registered Student Organizations]."

In other business, the Senate approved a $4.50 increase in the Student Activity Fee upon approval of a restructuring plan by the Board of Trustees. This is the first time the Senate has requested an increase in the Student Activity Trust Fund since 1986.

Senate leadership maintained that an increase in the SATF would safeguard against future budgetary crises and would benefit the students directly.

Senator Turco opposed the increase arguing that the student body as a whole cannot afford the increase.

"Let's not raise the taxes but evaluate the line items," he said.

Treasurer Rose said if the increase passes it will alleviate much of the strain that the Senate Budget Committee has had in making allocations for next year.

"With this increase [Student Senate] can increase what they give out to RSOs directly," she said. "I don't believe that the increase would be possible if the student activities organization remains within the trust fund because the increase then would go directly towards the cost of living increases and not towards students."

Yugoslavian history discussed

Harvard historian says Bosnia lacks a strong identity

By BRIAN C. O'NEILL
Collegian Correspondent

Noted Harvard historian and Yugoslav native Aleksa Djilas spoke on Yugoslavian history to a small crowd in the Stern Auditorium at Amherst College Tuesday night.

Mr. Djilas, who is a fellow for the Russian deptartment at Harvard University, lectured as part of a series for the Five College department of peace and world security studies (PAWSS). Djilas saidhis lecture's purpose was to better inform the Five College area about the crisis in the Balkans.

According to Djilas, the country of Yugoslavia literally means "South Slav." He said the nation was formed by the union of the three peoples of the Serbs, Croats and Slovecs.

Djilas said the country of Bosnia really lacks a strong identity, a fact which complicates the role U.N. peacekeepers should take in finding a solution to the ethnic and political violence that has engulfed the region.

Early on, many of the Bosnian people were Roman Catholic like their Croatian and Serbian neighbors, he said.

After the Ottoman Empire expanded, some of the Bosnian people converted to Eastern Orthodox.

"In the fifteenth century many of the Bosnian landowners decided to covert to Islam and many serfs followed," Djilas said. He said this mix of religions and people is how the Bosnian people lost a lot of their identity.

Djilas condemned the Serbian Nationalist leader Slobodan Milosevic, but expressed a lack of leadership opposing him.

"Milosevic is some what responsible for leading the Serbian nationalists, but most Serbians feel it's better to be a nationalist than not," he said. Djilas said, "Most Serbians don't blame anyone in particular, they feel everyone is to blame."

Mr. Djilas left a somber feeling in the lecture hall by comparing the atrocities of the Holocaust to those done by the Serbian nationalists.

Genocide and group violence was the topic discussed last night at the third of the six seminars on anti-Semitism sponsored by the Humanities Institute. Ervin Staub, a professor of psychology here at the University, gave the lecture and led discussion.

Last night, a group of 20 came to hear Staub, a Holocaust survivor and author of the Roots of Evil. Staub has traveled the globe and plans to meet with journalists to try to educate people and learn the behaviors and actions of groups.

He began with "how psychologically people can behave the way they do during the Holocaust — how humans are capable of wanting to exterminate another people." He explained how a person can develop this behavior which ultimately leads to genocide and group violence as it did with anti-Semitism.

"Human tendency is differentiating between us and them — love of some and fear of others," he said.

Some want art damage paid

By RACHEL D. MEDANIC
Collegian Staff

Damage and cleanup estimates for the Fine Arts Center calculated at $24,000 in the wake of a Feb. 26 pipe burst, but failed to include the value of student portfolios stored in a room on the third floor of the art department, said several art students.

The portfolios contained the work of Professor Kathy Leigh's Interior Design II class as well as other work the students had done in past semesters.

Alana Berger, a junior in her first year of interior design, was one of the students whose work was affected by the water.

"I will definitely have to invest more time and fix up the damage," Berger said.

Berger said she didn't know if the condition of her work was something prospective employers would be able to overlook. For many students, the portfolios contained what they would be expected to show at job interviews after they graduated.

Berger said some of her pieces were damaged beyond repair and others had ink smudges and warped backboards.

Junior art major Kim Counter said, "What frustrates everyone is that it was treated very lightly. A lot of us had a lot of time and money in it and no compensation is being offered."

Junior art major Jessica Stebbins said the department wouldn't let the students in to see their work until Tuesday, March

Prof. presents history 'from the bottom up'

By BRIAN GORMLEY
Collegian Staff

Bentley College history Professor Martha Toplin gave an audience in Herter Hall yesterday a view of history "from the bottom up."

Toplin spoke about her father's experiences growing up in the Jewish town of Ostrog, Russia in a lecture entitled "Erza's Stories: Jewish Life in Revolutionary Russia."

Her talk consisted mostly of stories her father had told her about his boyhood. Toplin said this was an attempt to tell history "from the bottom up, to get the view of the foot soldier instead of the general."

Toplin's first story about her father was called "My First Time in the Country." It is the story of her father, Erza, and his friend Andrey.

The two 11-year-old boys met at a school for Jewish kids. The two became such good friends that Andrey's father, a Russian Orthodox priest, invited Erza to visit their family on their estate in the countryside.

During his vacation from school, Erza stayed with Andrey's family. He learned to "ride horseback without a saddle, just riding on his back clutching the horse's mane, to fish with a rod and a net and to search for wild strawberries." To Erza, the priest's estate was "new and different, so much different from the narrow streets of home."

Later, when Erza returned home, he used the skills he had learned during his stay with his friend. After the revolution, during the "hunger years," Erza used his knowledge of farm animals and fruit trees to help feed his family.

Toplin said she trusts her father's memory even though he is 89 years old. She said studies have shown that as people get older, memories of their childhoods become sharper and more detailed.

Toplin said interest in Jewish history has become much greater in past 20 years. She also said the demand for history from the bottom up has increased as well. Toplin said she was unsure, however, whether her father's stories should be considered "history" or simply "memory." She said the distinction must be made in order to be

Tara Hartnett victim of society

The death of Tara Hartnett is yet another tragic reminder of the complete lack of respect for the rights and lives of members of oppressed groups (in Tara's case as a woman) in this society. We live in a country where one in three women is sexually abused during her lifetime; a nation where a woman is beaten every fifteen seconds.

If you think Tara's death is a special case because it is a product of an estranged relationship, think again. Most perpetrators of violence against women know their victims.

If you think that because her death occurred off-campus you're safe since you live on campus, think again. Last semester a graduate student was raped on campus by one of her fellow students. The number of reported incidents of sexual harassment on campus continues to climb.

If you think you're safe because you're not a woman, think again. Gay, African-American, Asian-American and Jewish male students have all been singled out for physical abuse and terrorization since last October. Even heterosexual, non-Jewish, European-American men, though much less frequently, have become targets as some members of oppressed groups strike back indiscriminately at members of the oppressor group.

If you think that the law will protect you from hate crimes, think again. Our legal system goes notoriously light on those who violate temporary restraining orders. While over 6 percent of the violent crimes that are reported nationally are rapes, less than 2 percent of arrests for violent crimes are charged with rape. In 1990 of the over 800 charges of civil rights violations by the police were filed with the Justice Department, only 53 were investigated. Of these investigations, only 35 cases were prosecuted. There were no criminal convictions.

So if you think that you couldn't be the next Tara Hartnett, please, think again. By believing that hate crimes aren't your problem, you set yourself and others on campus for future victimization.

You don't have to sit back and pray that you're lucky enough not to be the next statistic. By attending a mini-conference on mobilizing against hate crimes, you can learn how to protect yourself as well as defend the rights of others. This Saturday in the Campus Center will be a mini-conference entitled 'Fight Back the Hate'.

In knowing how to defend ourselves and by showing courage enough to confront and challenge those who deny the rights of any of our sisters and brothers here a UMass, we can make sure that Tara will be remembered as one of the last student-victims of oppression, not a long-forgotten name in an endless list of victims soon to come.

Greg Maney, Allied Students Against Prejudice Southwest

The meaning of strength

Tara Hartnett's five roommates walked ahead of us in a line, arms around each other, toward the campus pond. Their togetherness seemed to give them the strength to deal with the tragedy that had been handed them — strength that few of us could ever imagine to have were we in the same situation.

GREG SUKIENNIK

Strength. That word was used to describe Tara Hartnett constantly at her memorial service Tuesday night. Because of the way things happened we perceive her as a victim, but the Tara Hartnett her roommates spoke of was no weakling. No, she was a strong woman, strong enough to raise a child while still in school and strong enough to stand in the face of threats.

"I'm proud she didn't give in and proud she did what she believed in for her baby," one of her roommates said. "She did what she had to do."

Tara Hartnett didn't have to die. There's a system that's supposed to protect women in her situation, but that system failed her. That system put her in jeopardy for daring to be strong enough to stand up for what she believed in, strong enough to try and keep James Cyr away from her daughter. That system couldn't keep her safe from the things the police say he did.

But try as he allegedly did, James Cyr couldn't strip her of her strength, of her will, of her daughter. Before the memorial service it seemed he had taken everything away from her when he allegedly took her life. Afterwards it was clear he had failed miserably.

He failed because Tara Hartnett's strength lives on in her roommates and in her 11-month-old daughter. Anyone assembled at the memorial service could plainly see that strength when they got up to speak, when they hugged each other, when they stood, lit candles in hand near the campus pond and recounted what a wonderful, vibrant woman Tara Hartnett was.

The memorial service was full of poignant moments. Perhaps the most poignant moment of the memorial service was after a short prayer, when one of her roommates played a song that Tara had liked — "Tears in Heaven" by Eric Clapton. Glancing around I saw many become teary-eyed. I found myself among them, too.

Clapton, as some of you may know, wrote "Tears in Heaven" for his son Conor, who died tragically in a fall. As the song played, I looked over and saw the picture of Tara holding her daughter that was displayed on the memorial table. That's when it hit me that if Tara somehow knew her daughter was now safe and sound, perhaps there could be some meaning that could be saved from a death that was otherwise completely needless and tragic.

I remembered that one of her roommates had said Tara's goal in life had become her baby daughter and her family, and that everything else came second. She had given up two classes so that she could spend more time with her daughter.

Tara Hartnett wasn't planning to sacrifice her life for her daughter. No one would ever want or expect it. But whether she knew it or not, that's what she did.

I hope somehow Tara knows her family and friends are doing well and staying strong. I hope she knows that her daughter is safe and sound.

UMass could learn a thing or two

As many of my fellow students ventured to Florida I had the opportunity to see the University of Colorado at Boulder. I was walking with my friend when I noticed many white handprints around her campus. I asked what they meant.

"Everywhere you see a white handprint, a woman was raped on that spot."

It was alarming to walk by numerous locations where a violent crime had taken place. White handprints were abundant; you couldn't walk 50 feet without seeing one.

The dormitories had various posters warning women about rape with all sorts of statistics. Like UMass, Colorado supplies an escort service so women don't walk alone at night on campus. Colorado also provides their female students with something else: whistles.

My friend and all her girlfriends had rape whistles. I joked with her about blowing it. She told me if a whistle goes off everyone comes running to the scene. This was one of the stipulations: like with our fire alarm bell, anyone who falsely blows a whistle will be fined. On the other hand, if a student fails to answer a whistle call they could also be fined. People are hit hardest in their wallets as the saying goes. Colorado is making a big attempt to address the problem by putting the responsibility on everyone. It is a problem in society and educated and prepared students can prevent it together.

I realize this may not solve the problem of rape, but it puts us a step closer. The students feel safer walking around with a whistle, like help is a call away. The point of this article is to get UMass to adopt one of the University of Colorado's ideas. If Health Services can hand out a condom when a student has a cold, resident assistants can hand out a rape whistle when a student checks into a dorm.

Notes from the Campus Center Basement

This is important, there was a meeting Tuesday afternoon to give students input into the final decision on who is to become our next Chancellor. There were no more than 30 students who knew enough and cared enough to show up. Do you think these few students accurately represent either your views or the general views of the campus? Maybe they do, but probably they don't.

Chancellor Richard O'Brien is leaving and the search team for new candidates is looking for student input to the search process. They have narrowed the field to three candidates: Dr. Lois Proenza, Dr. David Scott and Dr. Claudia Mitchell-Kernan. If you want a say in this process you can go to the meetings, they are open to the entire campus community. You've missed the chance to meet Dr. Proenza, but Dr. Scott will be discussing multicultural and diversity issues from 9:15 a.m. to 10:30 a.m. on March 25 in Campus Center room 101. He will also be holding an open forum discussion in the Cape Cod Lounge (in the Student Union Building) from 3:30 p.m. to 5 p.m. on March 25. Dr. Mitchell-Kernan will be discussing multiculturalism and diversity on March 29 from 9:15 a.m. to 10:30 a.m. in Campus Center room 168C and he will be holding an open forum from 3:30 p.m. to 5 p.m. on March 29 in the Cape Cod Lounge. At these forums there will be information forms that participants can use to evaluate the candidates. Remember, this is your chance to decide the future direction of the University.

Now on to less important matters.

From the major headlines, the alleged world trade center bombers, did they take the Collision Damage Wavier when they rented the van. I can see the conversation now:

"Would you like the Collision Damage Wavier?"

"Does it cover if the van is blown up?"

"Why?"

"Nevermind, I'll take it anyway."

Matt

"O.K. Now I'll just need a major credit card. . ."

And now for something a bit more local, the nice new spring supplement phone book still has a backwards cover photo. You'd think that maybe they'd correct it.

Speaking of dumb things, in the last election, students overwhelmingly voted to "legalize" marijuana use on campus. This doesn't actually make it legal since it is still illegal under state law, it just makes us look stupid. With all the trouble this University has been having with its reputation because of budget cuts and racial tensions this "legalization" of marijuana certainly deals a blow to our reputation.

"I graduated from UMass-Amherst."

"Oh, the school the students voted to legalize marijuana at."

Now I'd like to say a bit on the subject of computers, in ASCII. . .

There wasn't that fun. If you really want to know what that said figure it out, or offer me a sufficiently large amount of money and I'll tell you.

Since it is the season for midterms, I thought I'd try to help you with your exams by giving you some answers A, C, B, True, False, True, 1492, 1771, Gengis Khan, Oxygen, 27 ml, 5 Newtons, .7 V and 0010 1010. If appropriate questions to these answers are not on your test don't use these answers. In any case good luck, especially to the people taking ECE 581.

Since it's officially spring (not that you'd notice with all this snow and slush) and the warmer weather can't be all that far off now (or can it?), I'll give you my list of cool places to go when it's nice out:

- In a hammock, preferably outside.
- Puffers pond (you can swim here).
- The Sugarloaf observation area (off Route 116 just over the Connecticut River out Sunderland way).
- The grass outside a building that has been taken over.
- Anywhere else outside.

Once upon a time graduation meant heading for success

It is truly a grey day. I just received my first rejection notice from the Real World in the mail. Sob. Harlequin Romance in New York City doesn't have a "suitable position" open for me. Whimper.

I applied to edit and develop manuscripts, but now it appears the realm of brawny heroes and saucy maidens remains forever closed. I bet they found out that in a pinch I once used the pages from a few of their books as a substitute for litter green. I thought that my cat wouldn't notice the difference, but then I found her wearing a sheer white teddy and french kissing her scratching post. Go figure.

I'm not terribly upset about this first ignoring of my pleas for a job, any job. I know this is only the first domino to fall in a line of many, and besides, I'm not afraid to graduate without a career lined up. I'm absolutely terrified.

It's funny, but once upon a time I thought graduation would beam me directly into an airy Soho loft with gourmet takeout in the fridge and cut flowers on the table. A friend of mine at Harvard thought the same, once upon a time. Now she's planning to work at a summer camp; she's gotten so many rejection notices she is abandoning the job search. A Harvard grad with a bachelor's degree in history and French literature wiping noses and squashing ticks for what technically equals less than 50 cents an hour. I realize this is making all of you impending graduates out there squirm with hope.

Lori
O'CONNOR

I don't know about you, but I don't feel prepared to enter the workforce. Choosing English as a major was the best and worst decision that I ever made. I simply don't have any of that gooey, viscous stuff called practical experience. What I do have is an intimidatingly large collection of dog-eared Cliff notes, with the neon yellow covers ripped off so as to avoid embarrassment.

I'm breaking out in itchy bumps while I type this, but business seems to be where it's at. The last job fair here was nothing more than a giant accounting major orgy, replete with stale bagels and Nestle products for number punchers who like to nosh. This time next year, School of Management graduates who lucked out will be punching time clocks at bustling corporations and utilizing some of that practical experience. I, on the other hand, will be loitering outside of the Haymarket Cafe with an "I will analyze your poetry for food" sign around my neck.

In anticlimactic option one, we jobless graduates could always go home to the suburban hell holes that spawned us. But as a sage friend of mine recently remarked, loading up Dad's stationwagon the day after commencement will feel like an admission of failure. Hey, look at me, I didn't prepare well! Besides, my hometown isn't exactly a land called Honahlee. Most of the residents think homosexuality is a contagion that spreads through the air like dandelion fluff. Watch out, Bertram, don't get too close, it might kiss you.

I bet any senior will agree that the parental pressure surrounding graduation is the most stressing aspect of the entire situation. Every other day, the Phone Call. So, Lori Ann, found a job yet? Gee Mom, I don't know. Have the planets realigned? Desperate, the other afternoon I answered the phone in a lilting Swedish accent. No, Lori is not here. She is out getting her eyelids tattooed. Ta Ta. Who needs Harlequin's "his fingers left a trail of electric fire in their wake" foolishness when you can have that kind of fun?

I'd better bolt. My Shrinky Dinks are burning, my anxiety is showing and horror of horrors, my phone is ringing. See you outside the Haymarket next year. Bring poetry.

Allo? Ici Sabine. Non, Lori? Elle n'est pas voici. . .

A plea for some justice

We would like to share with you the story of David Wong, an inmate at an upstate New York prison.

David is a 29-year-old Chinese national incarcerated in 1984 for robbery. In 1986, an inmate was stabbed to death at the Clinton Correctional Facility. Of the 700 prisoners in the yard at that time, David was singled out and accused of the killing. David was convicted in Clinton County (Plattsburgh), N.Y., of second degree murder. Clinton is one of the most historically brutal prisons in New York.

Kazu
IILJIMA

The prisoner David was convicted of killing had been at Clinton C.F. for only two weeks; David neither knew him nor had any past relationship with the deceased. David had no reason to kill the man. He wasn't even in close proximity to attack him. David was found guilty only on the testimony of the tower guard, who was 100-130 yards away, who changed his original story that "the attacker appeared to be White" to "the attacker was David Wong."

We feel there was incompetence on the part of the lawyer, suppression of evidence, denial of several inmates' testimony, that the trial was held in a racist environment and there were no people of color on the jury.

The prisoner had been stabbed to death, but no weapon was found on David, arrested minutes after the stabbing, nor in the prison recreation yard. The medical examiner testified that the dead prisoner's wound was so deep blood would have spurted from the wound, yet no blood was found on David Wong, his clothing, or the Chinese newspaper he was carrying.

David speaks Fucow and had difficulty understanding and speaking English. With no official Chinese interpreter, the court first went to Chinese restaurants to find someone to translate. They finally located a Chinese woman who worked for the county and spoke Mandarin. She had never translated before and had no experience with courts, legal terminology or simultaneous translations. She did not speak Fucow.

During the trial, both David and the translator told the court they were having problems communicating. David was forced to testify in Mandarin because it was the interpreter's language. During his testimony, the translator said it was difficult for her to say exactly what he was saying and maybe she was forgetting sentences. Asked if he could speak Mandarin, David said, "I understand it but it was very hard for me to speak, not very hard, it is difficult."

David can now not only converse and write fluently in English, but is also able to write his own legal briefs. He has a good rapport with fellow inmates and interacts in prison activities.

David has had a tough life in prison, especially as the object of guard brutality. Affidavits by fellow inmates have attested to the many times David has undergone irrational violence. Yet David has stood up to these harsh treatments, maintained his "cool" and carried on.

He has been isolated from family and friends for over eight years with little contact with the "outside world." Some of us who met him last year at Elmira Prison found him to be a reserved but straightforward, resilient, optimistic and spunky young man. He has not only won our committee's respect and admiration, but our urgent commitment to pursue justice for him. We have found that justice is too often illusory and also comes at a high price.

That is why we are coming to you. We hope you too, will be moved to help David, providing monetary support so his legal fees can be paid. We have retained an experienced, highly competent lawyer, Susan Tipograph, who is respected and recognized in the progressive communities of New York. Our committee is working in conjunction with David and his lawyer to get a retrial. We have several affidavits from inmates proving David is innocent.

David needs individual and community support from Asian and multinational communities and organizations. We urge you to contact the Support Committee and to write to David. Your assistance is crucial to fixing this terrible injustice. To help on David's case, for further information or to make a financial contribution to David's defense, contact the David Wong Support Committee.

Kazu Iiljima is a member of the David Wong Support Committee. Sandra Rose, a Collegian staff member and the UMass contact person for the committee, contributed to this column.

Hillary Clinton — future president?

Many people have already criticized Bill's loving wife for taking part in the formation of national health care reform. The argument: she was not elected by the public. Hmmm. Consider the fact that women are still looked upon as inferior beings in the workplace these days. Perhaps that's the only reason someone made the ridiculous point — prejudice.

I don't even want to get into the abortion issue N.O.W. but I will tell you this: there has only been one president of this country who was not married, and I can't even remember what he did. Hillary was ranked in the Top 100 list of the most respected lawyers in the country, however. I'd say she probably worked incredibly hard to get there.

An interesting point to remember in our everyday lives is that without women, there would be no family structure, no family values and no people. Gee, that's fairly obvious, and yet someone is probably reading this right now with the thought, "Hey, I'm a man, which means I'm naturally better than any female around." I wish I could say this point was sarcastic too, but it isn't.

In 1934, Ruby Black of the United Press asked Eleanor Roosevelt to explain her motivations behind the attempt to form a women's democratic organization. The reply was simple: "This Democratic party really believes in women."

I guess my main thought process is this: the next time you read those famed words, "All men are created equal," keep in mind that Hillary might have the power to officially dictate policy someday, as president.

Out, outraged, outrageous!

Lesbian/Bisexual/Gay Awareness Week is an annual event featuring lectures, workshops, and cultural programming that happens every spring at UMass. This year's theme is "Out, Outraged, Outrageous!" — for a number of reasons.

This is a time of simultaneous hope and backlash for lesbian, bisexual and gay people. President Clinton was elected into office by a margin that equaled the numbers of recognized gay voters. Clinton made good on his campaign promise and began the process to lift the ban on gays in the military. Soon after a gay man was brutally beaten by three Marines shouting "Clinton's gonna hafta learn. . ."

Ali F.
WOOLWICH

Voters in Colorado and Oregon were faced with ballot questions banning any legislation supporting equal civil rights for gay, lesbian and bisexual citizens; the initiative in Colorado actually passed.

The list of abuses that are the source of our outrage is long.

Last semester Governor William Weld held hearings to gather testimony from gay teenagers, in response to the statistic that one in three teen suicides in the United States is related to issues of coming out as a gay teen. He subsequently is supporting high school curriculum reform to include education around issues of sexual orientation, and sensitivity training to school service providers so they can better help gay teens.

On this campus, there is finally a permanent Chancellor's Task Force on Gay/Lesbian/Bisexual Matters in place to address ongoing issues and needs of the campus GLB community. We are out of the closet, and nothing can make us go back.

As of September 1992, we have lost over 160,000 people to AIDS, a disease which is currently spreading most rapidly in the heterosexual community. Lack of access to quality health care (due to economics and homophobia) has resulted in a rising death toll for lesbians due to breast, cervical and other forms of cancer.

On April 25, 1993 over 1 million people will gather in Washington, D.C. to "March for Lesbian, Gay and Bi Civil Rights and Liberation."

It is an exciting and challenging time to be bisexual, lesbian or gay. There are bigots who would have us all believe that the existence of gay, lesbian and bisexual people is outrageous. There are others who would "tolerate" the 2,500 gay, lesbian and bisexual students at this campus as long as they weren't too outrageous — that is, too visible and vocal. In a homophobic and heterosexist world, GLB people have had to have an outrageous sense of survival.

In the Northampton/Amherst area, one in seven people is gay, lesbian or bisexual. That means every seventh person you sit in class with, every seventh person on line in the dining commons, every seventh person you live in a residence hall with. What an amazing, wonderful thought that is. Happy Lesbian/Bisexual/Gay Awareness Week.

Ali F. Woolwich is coordinator of '93 Awareness week.

Save the endangered species act

The rancher's shaggy dog, like he had hundreds of times before, carried the lifeless form, usually a field mouse or ground squirrel, gently in its mouth. The rancher gave his hound a ritual pat and praised him for removing another pest from his fields. However, this time, the dead animal was no pest. Closer inspection revealed the small, black and white animal to be a black-footed ferret. There was only one problem: the black-footed ferret had been listed extinct for nearly 30 years. True story.

The Endangered Species Act (ESA), one of the oldest and strongest pieces of environmental legislation, now provides funding for recovery plans and protection of those species, plant and animal, lucky enough to make the list. Fortunately for the black-footed ferret, the few remaining of its species are now on the ESA protected list. Nearly 4,000 species are on the candidate list waiting to be declared endangered. For over 300 species, that wait has been too long and extinction has already occurred. How many more species can we afford to lose at an estimated rate of one per day?

The statistics are staggering:

- Between 1972 and 1988, nearly 2 million dolphins were killed by fishing fleets in the Pacific Ocean.
- With poachers killing up to 100 elephants a month, Kenya has lost 70 percent of its elephant population in the past decade.
- Ninety-nine percent of Brazil's Atlantic coast rain forest has been cleared, leaving only 25 percent of its original species.

Without the ESA these statistics will only grow. But just as the ESA protects species in jeopardy of extinction, the act itself is in danger of extinction.

The ESA goes before Congress every four years for renewal, and MASSPirg is working with other organizations such as Massachusetts Audubon and Greenpeace to ensure its strong renewal. A strong legislative initiative has been proposed to Rep. Gerry Studds that reinforces the ESA.

Don't feel you can't make a difference or that your voice won't be heard. Join MASSPirg's campaign. Write to your senator or representative to encourage them to support a strong bill and come to the benefit concert to be held in the Hatch Thursday. Together our voices will be heard above the political din. We were lucky enough to get a chance to save the black-footed ferret, but this could be our only chance to save the Endangered Species Act.

ing it starts with debilitating language in one group towards another which solidifies prejudice and hatred as a stereotype.

What leads to violence, Staub said, was the basic human needs for security, identity, comprehension of reality and hopes that arise, or fail to arise, during times of economic and political chaos. In order to deal with these problems and the effects of change, Staub said, people find scapegoats.

Because of Germany's loss in World War I and the ensuing internal confusion and humiliation, Germans found it comforting to take out their aggressions on minority group — the Jews. He compared the world's response with present day Bosnia and "ethnic cleansing."

Staub said, "If people would react, things would be different. We need an evolution towards enlightened self interest involving human rights."

"No one told us anything — the art department let rumors circulate," Stebbins said.

Earlier reports quoted University officials as calling the damage from the burst "minor."

Spokesperson Karin Sherbin said, "the term 'minor damage' was specifically in reference to money and not in any way connected to students' work."

Although there was speculation the burst was related to a heating problem that occurred the day before, Sherbin attributed the pipe's failure to that week's cold weather.

Sherbin said she did not know the rules concerning damage to student properties on University premises.

Yeltsin

his TV address.

Later Wednesday, Yeltsin met with Khasbulatov and Constitutional Court chief justice Valery Zorkin.

"The goal of the Supreme Soviet and the Congress leadership is not to stabilize the situation in the country, but to use any means to remove the lawfully elected president and open the way to power for the forces of revenge and totalitarian restoration," Kostikov said.

Khasbulatov rushed back to the parliament building to reconvene the Supreme Soviet and finalize the Friday Congress session.

He told legislators that the meeting was useful, but that Yeltsin did not "clearly understand the situation in the country."

"We want to offer the Congress some sensible alternative," Khasbulatov said. "I will make all efforts to find a normal base before the Congress."

Khasbulatov said he presented a list of demands to Yeltsin, including one for a government of national consensus and another to hold simultaneous, early presidential and parliamentary elections instead of the referendum.

Yeltsin has agreed to early elections, but opposes simultaneous balloting because he wants to outlast the Congress. Parliamentary elections currently are set for March 1995 and presidential elections for June 1996.

After Khasbulatov's speech, some anti-Yeltsin legislators began to shout from the floor, but were cut off and the speaker pushed through a final vote on convening the Congress and inviting Yeltsin to appear.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE

By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Your new self-confidence strengthens an already satisfying relationship. Keep any travel plans to yourself. Some secrecy will be necessary to pull off a deal.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): A new romantic relationship promises many benefits. Guard your reputation. An overheard conversation could prove embarrassing later on. Be honest when talking with a relative who can help you.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): A small windfall sends your spirits soaring. Combine your fertile imagination with hard work to boost profits. Tolerance is an asset in the business world.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Will you be top dog today or end up in the doghouse? Be careful not to bark at anyone - higher-ups can bark back. Contact with faraway friends could lead to a visit.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): You radiate confidence and ambition today. Go all out to promote a creative idea. If you believe in yourself, other people will cheer you on. Money flows your way.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): You receive last minute help when you need it most. If thinking about entering a different profession, seek experts' counsel. Learning high-tech skills will boost your earning potential.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): You may feel you must fight for your security. Domestic problems come to a head. Diplomacy and a willingness to compromise will avert a direct confrontation.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Pay back what you owe in funds or services even if you must work longer hours to do so. Your efforts will speak volumes about your character! Influential people applaud your diligence. Water your plants.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Your powers of persuasion are awesome today. Your plans fall into place. Flying solo is wiser and less costly than teaming up with a casual pal.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Play it safe in business to avoid unpleasant surprises. Abrupt or unconventional moves could get you into trouble. Use quiet diplomacy to woo a shy romantic partner.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Financial matters merit top priority today. Keep your temper under tight control and your rapport with a co-worker will improve. A test of friendship will only strengthen the bond.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Put your work surroundings in better order. Productivity rises when you know exactly where to find things. Good luck improves a worrisome financial situation.

Conner Henry, the Celts' three point legend that almost was?

Livingston Bramble, the "Buffalo Soldier" who had 13 pit bulls and who pummeled "Boom Boom" Mancini twice back in the early eighties?

Steve Garvey, the Dodger legend who was a legend when it came to paternity suits as well?

Tawny Kittaen, the beautiful icon who appeared in Bachelor Party, and is now having Chuck Finley's kid?

Another attention check, why are you still reading this?

Ivan DeJesus, the man who replaced Ernie Banks, but couldn't hit his weight?

Rusty Kuntz, the baseball player with the greatest last name? Pronounced Kooontz, you perverts.

Kurt Nimphius, the hoop legend known as the "Bird Man".

Buddy Biancalana, the Royals' World Series hero who waspossibly the worst shortstop ever?

Scott Drapeau, the UMass forward who said C'est la vie, and is now probably playing for his local YMCA team?

Jim Schoenfield, Devils coach who told ref "to go have another doughnut, you fat pig" and is now an announcer for ESPN? Probably the greatest thing ever said in sports history.

The Baseball Bunch, not a single entity, but together this crew formed as good a show as there ever has been. Always listen to "The Dugout Wizard". A great show. The player Merlin is the smartest player ever.

dramatically.

3.) St. Louis — Better concentration offensively needed to make the most out of no-power lineup.

4.) Chicago — Losing Maddux and Dawson will be too much to overcome despite strong free agent signings.

5.) Pittsburgh — Leyland and expansion is the difference between here and last place.

6.) Florida — This is not a misprint: a team with talent enough to finish fourth with some luck.

7.) Philadelphia — The haven for has-beens and could-have-beens but a lot of charisma and personality.

National League West

1.) Atlanta — The rich get richer with the signing of Maddux. Who needs a bullpen when complete games are so common.

2.) San Francisco — Clark, Bonds, Williams a devastating 3-4-5 combination, but patchwork pitching won't be enough.

3.) Houston — A slow start but a strong rotation will mean a strong finish.

4.) Cincinnati — Clash of egos without headstrong Piniella to mediate, plus Schott furor (not fuehrer) will be too confusing to contend.

5.) Los Angeles — Even with comebacks by Strawberry and Davis, the putrid defense and injury-prone rotation spell defeat.

6.) San Diego — Bargain-hunting GM lands Padres in the basement.

7.) Colorado — If you like home runs, check out a game at Mile High. Nied possible Rookie-of-the-year candidate.

ALCS: Baltimore in seven games, a fall classic duel.

NLCS: Atlanta in six games.

World Series: Atlanta in five games — The Braves, not the Bills will make this third time a charm.

Sloppy field may move men's lax home opener

By GREG SUKIENNIK
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's lacrosse team will be leaving a day early for its Saturday game at St. John's University in Queens, N.Y., in order to gain what has become a precious commodity in northeastern lacrosse circles because of poor weather: outdoor practice time.

The Gorillas, 0-1 and ranked 13th in the latest United States Intercollegiate Lacrosse Association poll, have left the friendly confines of Boyden Gym for E Lot in order to simulate game conditions. Outdoor play at Richard F. Garber Field is still impossible and the team's home opener next Wednesday vs. Brown could be postponed or moved.

Garber Field, the Gorillas' home site, is covered in snow and the ground underneath is the consistency of Cream of Wheat. According to Garber, a plowing attempt will be made today. If soft ground conditions make the field unplowable and unplayable, the Brown game could be postponed or moved to Brown's home site in Providence, R.I.

"If they plow or not depends on the playing surface," Garber said. "Right now it's mush, Mush and water."

Garber doesn't want to postpone the Brown game or lose home field advantage because of that game's importance. However, he also downplayed the complications brought on by the Blizzard of '93 and emphasized the elements his team can control; namely, how well they play lacrosse.

"I know the guys want to play at home," Garber said. "But if we win enough games we can get a home game for the playoffs and if we win that we can get another home game. We can't worry about things we have no control over."

"Johns Hopkins had to travel to Rutgers to play Princeton and they won (7-5)," Garber said, noting the number of games moved to alternate sites because of weather. "You've gotta be ready. The teams that do the job get in. . .you gotta go out and produce."

Redmen Field, where Saturday's game will be played (2 p.m. start) has an artificial surface. Garber said he would welcome the installation of the fake stuff at Garber Field, but only if it were done right.

"If it had heating coils and if it had the right kind of artificial surface it would be great," Garber said. "Look at what we accomplished at Virginia without being on a field. If we could've been outside in Feburary we might've won that game." He added that turfing Garber Field has been discussed.

Games Notes: Attacker Wes Depp suffered some deep bruises against Virginia but "he should be ready for Saturday," Garber said. Virginia, who beat the Gorillas 10-9 and are now tied for third in the USILA, face Hopkins this weekend. "Does one goal equal 10 notches in the poll?" Garber asked. Syracuse, after falling at Loyola 10-9 in OT, finds itself in a strange position: more losses than wins (1-2).

Snow forces sports indoors

By GLEN GOLAND
Collegian Correspondent

Spring, wonderful spring. Spring is when flowers bloom, when grass turns green, and when Mother Nature dumps foot after foot of powder on the University of Massachusetts athletic fields.

Spring sports teams have been forced into Boyden and Totman gyms to avoid Jack Frost and get their seasons off on the right foot. Members of all of the teams said, though, that it is no match for the great outdoors.

"You can't get fly balls inside," said UMass baseball coach Mike Stone, whose squad plays St. Joseph's Saturday. "Ground balls don't bounce the same inside as they do outside. We try to make things tough.

"We use wooden bats, which are harder to hit with and we make the players throw longer distances than normal. Fortunately, we played outside more recently than St. Joe's."

Pitcher John Alves echoed Coach Stone's feelings on playing in Boyden. "Being indoors is starting to get irritating. I think the whole team wants to get outside, even just to practice. The snow is affecting the whole team. We're not too happy."

On the other side of Boyden gym, the men's lacrosse team practices. Captain Rick Mullins said he isn't happy about the set-up either.

"It's only about half the size of a regular field. It's really hard to see the ball, especially for the goalies. It blends in with the walls."

E-Lot has been the practice site for the men's lacrosse team, but the recent snow has forced them indoors. Twenty shovels decorate head coach Ted Garber's office. "We're going to do something about the field tomorrow," said Garber. "We have a home game against Brown in a week. We're hoping we can get the field cleared or have it plowed, then have a hot dry weekend."

Softball coach Elaine Sortino is stressing sound fundamentals as a way of coping with the weather obstacles.

"The teams that work through it and stay tough are the teams that will play the best," said Sortino.

Shorter, more intense practices have also become part of the team's workouts.

This isn't only a UMass problem, but one the entire region has been forced to deal with. Atlantic-10 administrative assistant Ed Hamilton said, "Every year is the same thing.

We don't see any real problems yet. There are no rainouts for non-conference games. If schools want to make them up, it's up to them.

"The conference slate starts next week. No conference games have been affected."

MLB season nears opening day

Luke
ERICKSON

The 1992 season was the year of the injury, with virtually every team suffering losses — some worse than others. Top-line players had their seasons cut short and teams saw some of their best talent sit on the bench.

The fall of 1992 saw exciting pennant races in the Eastern divisions, especially in the American League where there was a three-team race for the first time in a decade.

Surprisingly, rookie managers were at the helm in Milwaukee and Montreal, and 1993 will be the test if they're for real — or just benefitting from beginner's luck.

The 1992-93 winter saw the first expansion draft in 16 years and more free agents (102) than the previous two winters combined.

What's in store for 1993? Tomorrow never knows, as the Beatles would say, but what do I say ? Well here goes. . .

American League East

1.) Baltimore — Veterans like Baines, Sutcliffe, Davis and Valenzuela will take the Baby Birds over the top.

2.) New York — Steinbrenner's patience will be tested severely, but Showalter will stay.

3.) Toronto — No. 2 (Morris) and No. 3 (Stewart) starters are 74 years old combined; rest of staff are career .500, 5.00 ERA pitchers. Too much subtraction, not enough addition.

4.) Milwaukee — Losing Bosio and Molitor will be too much for baseball's most improved division. Not enough power to complement Garner's go-goes.

5.) Cleveland — Avg. age of projected lineup: 24 years old; a still-developing team that will contend in 1994.

6.) Boston — Spahn (Clemens) and Sain (Viola) and pray for rain will be the Beantown chant 45 years later in 1993.

7.) Detroit — Kirk Gibson? Is this the answer for an all-hit, no-pitch, Geritol-popping (12 players over 30) team?

American League West

1.) Chicago — A potent offense and a strong bullpen will overcome thin rotation.

2.) Kansas City — An old-fashioned one-for-one (Jose for Jefferies) solves the Who's on third / Who's in right dilemma.

3.) Minnesota — Despite Winfield's leadership, there are still too many holes to win it all.

4.) Oakland — A team in transition, and LaRussa will save the A's from complete destruction.

5.) Seattle — Lou Piniella won't settle for Murphy's Law mindset of past 17 years.

6.) Texas — Ancient pitching staff will keep the Oklahoma-to-Arlington train busy. Oh, but what power.

7.) California — Hopefully Herzog will be around when the Romper Room roster matures.

National League East

1.) Montreal — The Alous get a whole season together, and will prove that they're for real.

2.) New York — On paper, the second-best rotation in baseball (what else is new?) but the hitting has to improve

A deep look at some obscure cult heroes

Jeff
CROFTS

Let's take a trip down memory lane. It is time to reminisce about all the cult heroes of the days gone by.

Remember:

Sixto Lezcano, of Brewer fame?

Eric Fernsten, the worst Celtic backup center ever?

Stan Jonathan, hockey's old lightweight champion?

Caveman Lee, the substitute who Marvin Hagler knocked out in say 7 seconds?

Mario Mendoza, the Mariner shortstop for whom the Mendoza line (.200) is named?

Charles Bradley, the old Celt who used to excite the crowd with thunderous dunks during warmups only to never be seen or heard from again for the rest of the night?

Tony Garea, tag team champ in the WWF along with Rick Martel? The fact that I remember he is from Auckland, New Zealand is pretty sad.

Dave Stapleton, the Sock who was the ultimate One-Hit-Wonder with his 'I'm a pencil' stance?

Mike O'Koren, Mr. Net of the mid eighties? A sad statement.

Sid Finch, the man who threw 168 mph in a cruel joke played by Sports Illustrated and George Plimpton?

Tim Laudner, the greatest RBI Baseball player ever?

Larry Dallas, the used car dealer who lived above Jack Tripper in Three's Company? (Just seeing if you're still paying attention) I hope you're not.

Rick McGraw, Wrassler known as "Quickdraw" who was pretty bad?

Omar Moreno, the base stealing king for the Pirates during the "We Are Family" years?

Milt Newton, the athletic Jayhawk who helped Manning in '88?

The Mystery of Edwin Drood

By LISA CURTIS
Collegian Staff

The UMass Theatre Guild has been holed up in practices and rehearsals for their latest production, The Mystery of Edwin Drood, for the last three months. Forgoing any semblance of a decent Spring Break, the cast stayed in Amherst and braved the blizzard to perfect their production of this solve-it-yourself murder-mystery-musical by Rupert Holmes, loosely based upon the novel of the same name by Charles Dickens.

"It's totally unlike any play I've ever seen," says Director Daniel DeFrance. "The audience votes on how the show ends." Edwin Drood is a play within a play in which the company of the Music Hall Royale portrays the trials and tribulations of the populace of Victorian Cloisterham. The title character is murdered, and it is up to the audience to decide "whodunnit."

"Our production is unique in that we interact with the audience. There are ad libs and inside jokes. We adapt for the audience," says DeFrance. "It's a David Letterman, on-your-toes type of comedy."

The cast of Edwin Drood includes Donald Medeiros as the chairman William Cartwright, Ceit McCaleb as Edwin Drood, Barak Tulin as the villainous John Jasper and Hilary Chazanoff as the Miss Rosa Bud.

"The cast is hysterical and fun to watch," says DeFrance. "Some are outstandingly funny. They really let go and ad lib."

As for the behind the scenes "cast of thousands" Production Manager Jen Welty has led the team. She's assisted by Musical Director Gregory Mayer and Stage Manager/Assistant Director Nicole Chiasson.

Director DeFrance is on exchange from Montana where he has been focused on directing films. "This play offers so much more than film ever could," says DeFrance. "It's so magical in terms of the amount of interaction the cast can have with the audience. You can't reach your audience to that degree with film."

The audience feedback is taken by vote takers who will actually mingle with audience. All of the various, possible endings have been rehearsed painstakingly, though only the ones voted on by the audience will actually see the light of the stage.

"We're right on the money," says DeFrance. "It's gonna be a good show."

The Mystery of Edwin Drood will be performed in Bowker Auditorium tonight through March 27 at 8 p.m. Tickets are $4 for students and $7 for the general public and are available at the Fine Arts Center Box Office and at the door.

Loud Music Festival: non-stop and noisy

By ADAM GOULSTON
Collegian Staff

Radius Management has amassed a array of over 30 alternative bands of local and national prominence, reserved Noho's three best alternative venues and arranged to bring it all together in two days of angst, feedback, and great music.

It's called the Loud Music Festival and it's the brain-child of David Beaupre who runs Jama Disc Records also out of Northampton. The Loud Music Festival will span this Friday from 8 p.m. to 1 a.m. and Saturday from 2 p.m. to 1 a.m. at Pearl Street, The Iron Horse and The Hotel Northampton.

With over 30 bands playing four stages in two nights, the viewer can pick his/her favorites or check out a group (s)he's merely heard about in passing.

Gobblehoof are finally approaching success on a national level after toiling in the Valley for some time. Gobblehoof produce what Billboard described as "deep underground sounds," uniquely Valley. Catch them at The Iron Horse on Friday.

The Swirlies sometimes struggle to free themselves from comparisons to dream-noise disciples My Bloody Valentine. Although the Cambridge quartet often thrives on the same experimental waves as MBV, the greatest similarity is the quality of their experimentation and it's strong hints of Boston grit.

Says Alternative Press, the Swirlies music "(imitates) the frustrating momentum of a Boston traffic jam." They play Pearl Street on Friday.

Angry Johnny is a Pioneer Valley relic. Performing for years with assorted accompaniment and sometimes only his guitar, Angry Johnny grieves and growls as a cult figure for his devoted locals. Johnny graces the stage of the Hotel Northampton Saturday afternoon.

Also of special note are Cell, Springhouse (a new Caroline band), Hypnolovewheel, and Sub Pop artist Boston's Green Magnet School. Strictly on an intriguing name basis check out Backwash, Crack Sex and Piss Factory. For a chance at free tickets check out the giveaway in the Collegian.

A showcase of this magnitude is a unique and possibly exhausting way to spend your weekend. Like they say in Latin, carpe diem — seize the day. Here's your diem, now go carpe, better yet two diems.

The Loud Music Festival takes over Northampton's Pearl Street, Iron Horse and Hotel Northampton on Friday from 8 p.m.-1 a.m. and Saturday from 2 p.m.-1 a.m. Tickets available at Main Street Records and The Northampton Box Office.

Jazz vocalist Betty Carter to close conference

By JON LUPO
Collegian Staff

Style. That's what jazz vocalist legend Betty Carter is all about. This Grammy-award winning wonder will make her way to the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall tonight as the finale to the 20th Annual Black Musicians Conference.

The legendary story of Carter's rise to national acclaim started when she was a teenager. Even then, she was performing with jazz greats Dizzy Gillespie, Charlie Parker, Miles Davis, Max Roach, Duke Jordan and when she was 18, she joined Lionel Hampton's Band. Under Hampton's tutelage she learned how to run a band and how to put her musical ideas on paper.

New York City called to her in 1951 and she was ready to be on her own, culling a stellar reputation as a vocalist. Later, during a gig in Washington, D.C. with Miles Davis, an introduction to his agents led to a tour and a recording with Ray Charles.

Carter continued recording, only this time it was solo. She recorded for various major record labels throughout the '50s and '60s and launched her won label, Bet-Car, in 1969.

Carter's mesmerizing voice, full of improvisation and rich feeling, has garnered her a long career filled with honors. In 1988, she won a Grammy for Look What I Got and was also nominated that same year for a duet with Carmen McRae.

For the fourth year in a row Carter was named Female Jazz Singer of the Year by Down Beat's Annual Critic's Poll and was just awarded an American Jazz Award for not only Album of the Year and Vocalist of the Year.

It doesn't stop there. Carter's appearance on "The Cosby Show" and in Spike

Listen to This: mediocrity mars new releases

By KEN MAIURI
Collegian Correspondent

The word of the week is mediocrity, so prick up your ears, don't do anything rash, take some advice and hold onto your cash: listen to this . . .

On the Mouth
Superchunk
Matador Records

Don't believe the hype. Every "alternative" music critic and their grandmother goes nuts for Superchunk, and I've yet to find out why. They're not an awful band, but why they should stand out from the pack of flannel-garbed off-key whiners is a mystery. On the Mouth is filled with loud, fast songs that all sound alike — weak and half-baked.

But then, in the middle of this desert of North Carolina pseudo punk-grunge is an amazingly powerful song, "The Question Is How Fast," where all of Superchunk's weaknesses (Mac's strained lead vocals in particular) are used to their advantage. The song is available on a compact disc single: buy that and leave this album behind for the next Spin reader. C

The Downward Road
The Pursuit of Happiness
Mercury Records

Yet another case of a stunted band. In 1988, The Pursuit of Happiness came out of Canada with an album full of catchy, intelligent, ironic and damn-funny rock songs like "I'm An Adult Now" and "Looking for Girls," and a unique sound (sort of like "Abba hooks up with AC/DC"). Their 1990 follow-up was more mellow and juvenile. With their latest release, TPOH has turned up the amplifiers to hide the increasingly one-dimensional lyrics.

Their lead vocalist, Moe Berg, is uncontrollably horny, but whereas the first album found him making insightful observations, these days he's content just whining about sex. Musically the first half of the disc is a comeback of sorts, with solid riffs and catchy tunes like "Cigarette Dangles," and "Nobody But Me;" the constant verging-on-Whitesnake electric thumping gets tiresome before the disc is anywhere near being over, though. Proceed at your own risk. B

Altered States
Hypnolovewheel
Alias Records

They blew it. Hypnolovewheel could be such a cool band: the four guys from Long Island has a great disc last year (Angel Food — buy it!) brimming with hook-filled, simple and loud songs. On their newest release, the pop-noise band has taken a big step backwards by surrounding their lame lyrics with even lamer music.

Hypnolovewheel used to take a catchy tune, throw in a lame-sounding chord to keep things interesting and camouflage it with extra guitar noise. These days they're content to sound loud and flaky, and they've recycled riffs and rhythms from earlier, better songs. "Turn You Off" isn't bad, and "Model Railroad" is cool in a subdued sort of way, but the rest is really disappointing. Sigh. C+

75% Fat Free
Chris Mars
Smash Records

Those he was once the drummer for the scrappy Replacements, Chris Mars has gone solo with a vengeance: his newest disc is his second in one year. Mars plays all the instruments except bass, and he has a very distinct singing and lyrical style—unfortunately many of the songs end up sounding similar.

75% Fat Free has enough hooks to carry the listener through, however. "Car Camping" is funny and comes complete with sound effects that sneak out the sides of the speakers, "BS Detector" is a typical riff-happy Mars tune, and "Nightcap" is a jazzy instrumental featuring a clarinet. Lee's Mo' Better Blues gave her even more accolades. In March 1992, Lincoln Center presented "Betty Carter Big Band With Strings: The Music Never Stops," an entire evening devoted to the singer. She recently released her sixth recording, It's Not About the Melody, featuring the eclectic talents of her current trio and Mulgrew Miller, Lewis Nash, Christian McBride, John Hicks, Jeff "Tain" Watts, Walter Booker and Craig Handy.

In addition to her concert with her Trio this evening, Carter will present the master class Participation in Song today from 2 to 3 p.m. at the FAC Concert Hall. Throughout this unique hour, Carter and her Trio will demonstrate their improvisational techniques by responding — in song — to audience questions. The only catch is that the questions must be sung to the musicians.

If you can't make the presentation, be sure to see Betty Carter and her Trio at this evening's concert. This is definitely the jazz performance to beat. Don't miss it.

Betty Carter and her Trio will perform at the FAC Concert Hall tonight at 8 p.m. Tickets start at $18, with half-price for Five College students. Call the FAC Box Office at 545-2511 for ticket reservations.

Denzel & Clint duke it out for Best Actor Oscar

This is the fourth in a six-part series highlighting the major nominees for the 1992 Academy Awards which will be presented on March 29.

By JON LUPO
Collegian Staff

Hollywood, like every place else it seems, is a man's world. While the Best Actress category has had to struggle to find enough eligible nominees, the Best Actor category has had worthy performances almost spilling over the proverbial envelope.

This year is no exception. In a year that brought us big screen bio-epics on Columbus (two, in fact), Malcolm X, Hoffa and Chaplin, there were more than enough roles for great actors to strut their stuff in. Add in a schmaltzy drama, a dizzying romantic thriller and a sturdy Western and you've got this year's nominees for Best Actor.

Let's dispense with the you-have-no-chance-in-hell nominee: Robert Downey, Jr. Perhaps the only decent thing about the pointless Chaplin (mercilessly dubbed on "Saturday Night Live" as Craplin) was Downey's courageous lead performance. However, remember folks, this was the same guy who did Less Than Zero and The Pick-Up Artist. 'Nuff said.

This may be sacrilegious to say, but Clint Eastwood's unimpressive spin on every other killer-of-few-words he's ever played was the blandest thing about Unforgiven. For some odd reason, he won the L.A. critics award for Best Actor and may be part of an Unforgiven sweep. It may make your day Clint, but you don't deserve it.

All throughout the overlong Scent of A Woman, at about hour 18 or so, I noticed how much Al Pacino was acting. Not just acting, but ACTING! — the kind you do for, well, Best Actor awards. The cornball scene at the end, where Pacino gives a histrionic underdog speech at the prep school, has "Oscar Clip" written all over it. He deserves it for all he's done in movies (the Godfather trilogy, Dog Day Afternoon), but not for this smarmy piece of crass, tearjerking pulp.

Irish actor Stephen Rea was the glue that held The Crying Game together. Rea's journey from disillusioned Irish Republican Army terrorist to a complex love triangle was fascinating to watch. Rea was excellent, but this year his performance was eclipsed by Denzel Washington's superb turn in Malcolm X.

Whatever your opinions of Malcolm X (the best film of 1992 in my opinion), nothing could touch Washington's masterful, richly emotional performance as the sometimes infamous Black leader throughout his ever-evolving consciousness.

From his early scenes as a street hoodlum to his rise as an enigmatic Islamic leader, to his eventual disavowal of those ideals, Washington let go his star aura and truly became Malcolm X. No other performance this year could match Washington's amazing complexity and grace.

Tomorrow, I'll take a look at Best Director. Even though the academy left out Spike Lee (yeah, that was smooth), the race is still on. Will Clint Eastwood win even though he doesn't deserve it? Now, that would be unforgiveable.

COURTESY WARNER BROS.

Denzel Washington, seen here in "Ricochet," is Jon Lupo's choice for Best Actor for "Malcolm X."

Fonda can't rescue Point-less remake

By JON LUPO
Collegian Staff

This unnecessary remake of Luc Besson's stylish French flick La Femme Nikita has one thing going for it: not many people saw the original. This reason alone will probably make the overblown Point of No Return a big hit — it's not necessarily bad, it's just a shameless rip-off (try scene for scene) of one of the most action-packed, satisfying foreign films in recent memory.

There are big differences between the dark import and this gaudy retread. While the 1990 original drenched itself in cool-blue hues and had a spiky flavor to it, Point falls over itself to be "blockbuster" — upping the explosions and firepower — all while reducing the central conflict to a stale redemption storyline with flashy sets. Ah, the American way.

Point tells the story of Maggie (the erratic but engaging Bridget Fonda), a drugged-out hoodlum who is offered an impossible choice after she's killed a cop in a drugstore shoot-out: death or retraining as a government assassin. She chooses the latter and is transformed from bitchy scuzzball to sleek markswoman by government agents Bob (Gabriel Byrne) and Amanda (Anne Bancroft).

Maggie, now with covername Claudia and code name Nina, goes out into the real world — Venice, Ca. She meets a guy (Dermot Mulroney) and falls in love. This naturally complicates things when Maggie must scoot out to blow up a floor of a hotel or assassinate someone.

Director John Badham (Bird on a Wire) has obviously seen La Femme Nikita many times — he copies scenes and shots with glaring gall, seemingly oblivious to the plain fact he's stealing from someone else's directing work.

Yet there are differences. A key scene early on in the film, where Maggie must escape from a restaurant kitchen after she's killed someone. In Nikita, the scene was quick and brutal — and also included a spellbinding bullet POV shot, a precursor to the famous Robin Hood arrow sequence. Nikita, alternating rage and fear, hurries back to confront Bob.

In Point, the scene is achingly drawn out: more guns and an annoying reliance on slow motion in order to clarify the action. Maggie runs to see Bob as well, but this time it's pouring rain and she stops on a bridge and, with the Jefferson Memorial glowing in the background, disposes of her gun in the water, all the while bawling her eyes out. Talk about subtle, eh?

Trumped up sequences like the above plague the film. Badham has also seen fit to change the ending, pitting Maggie and a notorious agent played with striking malevolence by Harvey Keitel against each other on the edge of a cliff. Point's reliance on processed action movie cliches and garish explosions only serve to point out how uninspired the whole production is.

Badham, in his attempt to clear up any ambiguities in the original story, has made it all the more unbelievable. While the inherent mystery and intrigue of the rain soaked French streets as well as the cipher-like performance by lead Anne Parillaud (Innocent Blood — but don't hold it against her) allowed for a stylistic suspension of disbelief in Nikita, Fonda can't seem to uphold Parillaud's delicate balance of danger and pathos.

First of all, she's completely unbelievable as the druggie punk; as if a straggly black 'do and swearing make you trashy. Her transformation is quite remarkable even for a movie: all she needed it seems, was a light brown wig and table manners training. Later, when she hops over a railing down to a table below in the aforementioned restaurant scene, it's like watching Wonder Woman with a silly wig.

Badham, obviously too busy mugging the original (no wonder he asked the cast and crew not to see it), doesn't seem to direct the actors. Gabriel Byrne, still stinging after trying to have sex with a cartoon Kim Basigner in Cool World, is adequate, though the hinted romance between Bob and Maggie is now plain unrequited love.

Anne Bancroft, looking old and overacting wildly, doesn't bring much to her thin role. Dermot Mulroney, as the token boyfriend, is hard to see through his scraggly facial hair. Harvey Keitel, though, is genuinely scary and fills his small role with icy terror.

Point is entertaining in an afternoon movie matinee kind of way, and you definitely get a lot of movie for your buck. But the fact that the film amounts to celluloid plagiarism leaves a smarmy aftertaste. Remakes can work — Sommersby for instance — but the only reason for this pale remake is to make a buck.

I'll be honest: La Femme Nikita wasn't rocket science, but it did have something to say about feminist identity, albeit with an MTV eye and impressive firepower. Point of No Return, on the other hand, ends up being your garden variety woman-in-jeopardy action movie with bigger explosions. Rent the original — then fasten your seat belts. C-

A Far Off Place — Solid performances by teen actors Reese Witherspoon and Ethan Randall as well as a strong pro-enviroment theme make up somewhat for the big plot holes and occasional lapses into preachiness. The story of two teens who travel across an African desert while being pursued by the elephant poachers who killed their parents. They bring along the family dog and a local bushman.

Stunning desert and bush cinematography by Juan Ruiz-Anchia highlight this mini-epic from Disney which also boasts a new Roger Rabbit Short, Trail Mix-Up.

The story may be too intense for younger kids, but A Far Off Place is a mostly wonderful adventure flick that's message is better than its sometimes creaky plot. The kids, for instance, don't really seem too unnerved by their parents' deaths. Also, they emerge from presumably weeks in the desert looking darn healthy. One more thing — the dog, even though he's going across a desert for chrissakes, never pants! The message, though, is worth these occasional gaps in logic. Worth an afternoon matinee.

Trail Mix-Up is another silly Roger Rabbit cartoon and it looks as though the formuia is wearing thin. Roger and Baby Herman go to the woods and make a mess of it. Jessica Rabbit does her usual cameo, this time as a sexy camp ranger. Fun, but it's getting repetitive. A Far Off Place: B Trail Mix-Up: C

Original Nikita is a stylish, neo-noir roller coaster

By ADAM SCOTT ROBERTS
Collegian Staff

It's been done before, American filmmakers taking exciting French films like Jean Luc Godard's A Bout de Souffle and making American versions (Breathless). Well, the Americanization of 1990's La Femme Nikita, now called Point of No Return, was also a big mistake.

The original French flick, released on video in letterbox form with English subtitles, is an action-packed story about a rebel with a cause.

French actress Anne Parillaud plays a rebellious street punk that is imprisoned for the murder of a police officer. She is given a choice of death or to be transformed into an undercover, female Terminator.

After being shown photos of her staged death she is forced to go through training in what appears to be an underground "Star Trek" enterprise. There she practices shooting at a shooting range. After blowing away the paper outline of a human body, one trainer asked her if she had practice shooting and she responds by saying that she's never practiced on paper.

The film has its humor with odd twists such as when they take her out and test her abilities as an assassin. Early in the film, she is tricked and is given a faise escape route; she survives and proves herself successful.

The acting by Parillaud is top notch. She fills the character with a zest as she screams and rides an emotional roller coaster throughout the 117 minute film. Her character is taken to Venice on a vacation where she is with her lover. Her code name is Josephine; her lover thinks her name is Marie; and her real name is Nikita. She has no choice but to kill to survive.

In one scene, she is called at a moments notice to stake out some unknown people while she is in her hotel room. Suspense builds as her lover awaits her outside the bathroom door as she focuses on her target.

In another circumstance she is called to show up at a hotel in Venice, Italy where she acts as a room service waitress. Such secret maneuvers remind me of No Way Out.

The film explodes with suspense and the subtities only aid in helping you be more drawn in they you already are. You won't want to pause for even a second. As for film techniques, it is similar to a film noir. Dark wet streets, low key lighting and the emphasis on this woman aid in making it a true neo-noir film.

La Femme Nikita intrigues as it entertains to the utmost exciting film experience. Grab a bag of that microwave popcorn, dim the lights and enjoy this fantastic French action movie. I haven't seen the remake — nor do I want to — because this Nikita is satisfying enough. A

Inspiring visuals power Arthur legend Excalibur

By MARTIN BROWN
Collegian Correspondent

Movies that create a whole new universe really impress me. The whole process of taking written-down fantasy or science fiction and transferring it to the screen is an amazing achievement. Movies like Blade Runner, Legend, The Star Wars Saga and Conan the Barbarian are awesome because there is absolutely nothing taken for granted. All the scenery has to be new and different. All the ideas have to be fresh and visionary. It really gives filmmakers a chance to create something that people would never see otherwise.

Excalibur Video Pick of the Week

Which brings me to the movie Excalibur. I just finished watching the movie again for about the tenth time (I first saw the movie when I was 11 years old in 1981 when it first came out) and i am still quite amazed by it.

Excalibur is, of course, about Arthurian legend — how Arthur became king, how he united Camelot, and eventually, how he died. The title of the movie refers to Arthur's magic sword — a mystic weapon forged by the dragon that created and is entwined with the land. It is a beautiful tale of love, honor, passion and truth.

Director John Boorman (The Emerald Forest) makes the movie visually just beautiful. Excalibur has some of the most powerful and inspiring scenes on film. For instance, when King Arthur realizes that he must lead an army against his evil son, Mordred, he and his men charge from Camelot through a flower orchard in full shining battle regalia to the music of Carmina Burana: Introduction. This scene gets me every time.

The acting performances are incredible too. Most noticeably, Nicol Williamson as the magician Merlin. In a role that most people imagine as semi-pathetic caricature, Williamson plays Merlin with incredible wit and charm that will probably stir some atavistic (a GRE word if there ever was one) belief.

Nigel Terry also puts in a solid performance as Arthur. He certainly looks the part, but he has trouble going from energetic youth to aged old man. Don't get me wrong though, Terry does take a legend and make a man out of him. For that you have to respect his performance.

Other strong performances are Helen Mirren (Where Angels Fear to Tread) as Morgana, Nicholas Clay as Lancelot and Gabriel Byrne (Miller's Crossing) as Luther Pendragon, Arthur's father. Trekkie fans may like to know that Patrick Stewart (Captain Picard) has a small role as one of the Knights of the Round Table.

a superior band, is opening up for them? The mind boggles. The band seems to draw legions of fans thanks to their novelty tunes ("Cheesecake Truck," "Jesus Was Way Cool," "Take Stuff From Work") which are funny for a few listens but certainly nothing to make a career out of. Otherwise, King Missile plays god-awful, humorless prog-rock. Ugh.

Happy Hour's best time is the 23-second "Glass," another cute joke from lead yelper John S Hall. Unfortunately it's surrounded by 59 minutes and 37 seconds of sludge like "Ed" and "Take Me Home." And "Detachable Penis" is just another smug King Missile slap at the audience, while the band proves they are becoming the 'sensitive artists' they once lampooned so effectively. Oh man, why? F

The movie covers a lot of material but sticks to the bare bones of the legend so you really should pay attention while watching the movie. If you run to the bathroom in the middle of it, you'll probably miss something important and you'll be scratching your head later wondering what is going on.

I think this may be the reason some other critics didn't like the movie as much as I did. They must not of been paying attention to the story (probably feeding their face on popcorn), so they got lost in the middle.

Even if Arthurian legend really doesn't interest you that much, still check out Excalibur because it could change your mind. The movie takes a really old tale and turns it into a beautiful epic that is sure to let your imagination wander. It's a great way to spend a Sunday afternoon. (Rated R. 140 minutes)

Chancellor finalist talks student issues

By CHRISTINA ROTHWELL
Collegian Staff

Chancellorship finalist Dr. David K. Scott discussed his views on student issues yesterday afternoon with students and faculty in the Cape Cod Lounge.

Scott said that when he was Michigan State's provost from 1986 to 1992 he held open office hours for students, and would continue to hold open forums with students at the University of Massachusetts. He held walk-in hours from 1 to 5:30 p.m. every Thursday for about a year, but had to stop because of time constraints and individuals coming forward with personal grievances, he said.

Scott said he met with students at Michigan State on a regular basis, but added "I don't think the burden of educating the administration should fall on the students."

However in response to a woman in the audience saying she was tired of educating the administration, Scott said "I beg of you, don't give up in trying to educate administration and colleagues. There is no single enemy here."

Scott said because everyone coming to the University brings prejudices and baggage, he would like to have forums where people could talk about their bigotry.

When asked what his definition of multiculturalism was, Scott said, "I think the difference between diversity and multiculturalism is diversity implies demographics, while multiculturalism focuses on values and strengths. . ."

Scott said differences among cultures should be valued, and there should not be an attempt to create a homogenous society.

He said one of the programs he implemented at Michigan State was to recruit freshmen according to the racial diversity of graduating high school seniors across the state.

Six years after the program's implementation, the racial makeup of incoming students at the university almost reflects the pool of graduating seniors, Scott said.

The University of Massachusetts should also be working to keep high school students in school, Scott said.

Scott said in Michigan he worked on implementing mandatory general education courses for all four undergraduate years, and would like to do the same at UMass. He said he would also want students to be oriented on diversity during their first year.

He estimated these programs would take about three years to implement at UMass.

Scott said he would offer scholarships to women and minorities, and pressure departments to hire them. He would also offer a prestigious award for students, staff and faculty who have done the most in combating racism, said Scott, who implemented similar programs at Michigan State.

Also Scott said he would make people aware of using sexually biased words, because "language is a reflection of our culture."

Scott said he got a 35-member task force together to examine a Michigan State undergraduate's experience. He said he also created a task force to examine lesbian, bisexual and gay issues.

He said he did not believe in raising the University's tuition, but would prefer to see an increase in state taxes to fund higher education.

"I really don't like him. I heard a number of things that made me a little nervous," said Student Government President Jen Wood. "He seemed to think that high tuition, high aid was an option, when we were finding ourselves without state funding. . . I was not particularly impressed with his ability to deal with students and to confront difficult issues with them. He felt distant."

Chantell Branch

The program was organized by Nicholas McBride, professor of journalism at the University of Massachusetts and a graduate of the High School of Commerce. McBride has visited the high school to speak to the students about the opportunities they have after graduation.

The students arrived on campus at 8:30 a.m. and indulged in an impromptu tour. The seniors in the group filled out applications to the University for fall semester, 1993.

Mike Smist, who led the group, teaches journalism at the high school and is the advisor to the school's paper, The Commerce Executive. He purchased with his own money the ten computers the school paper uses and helps the students put out issues that run whenever they can raise enough money for printing.

Smist said the paper has a zero budget and remains unfunded by the school system. He said the students raise money through advertising and from a snack bar they set up in the journalism classroom.

He said the experience of running a school paper is a good one for the students. He also said last year the students had an opportunity to "scoop" the Springfield Union News on a story about the principal resigning.

"They didn't know how influential they can be with their writing," Smist said.

He said the paper has a circulation of about 2,000. Many local citizens ask to have the paper mailed to them because it is "controversial," according to Smist.

How to write memoirs

Authors talk on analyzing personal pasts

By FRANCIS ZERA
Collegian Staff

"Personal Writing: The Given Story" was both title and theme to Thursday morning's panel discussion, part of "The Art of Nonfiction," writers conference in Memorial Hall, which is sponsored primarily by the University of Massachusetts journalism department.

The discussion featured three respected writers, Patrice Gaines, Brent Staples and Jay Neugeboren, and was followed by a discussion on financing book projects.

In writing their memoirs, all three writers said they learned to decipher their pasts, conference moderator Doug Weiner observed. Weiner is an author, educator and former student of Neugeboren. He said writing a memoir requires purpose, structure and vision.

Essayist Brent Staples is an editor for the New York Times and is working on a memoir titled "Parallel Time."

Jay Neugeboren is an English professor at the University and has published several books, including "The Stolen Jew," and "Before My Life Began."

Neugeboren's memoir focuses on his relationship with his schizophrenic brother, who has spent the last several decades in different mental institutions. The book is titled "His Heart, My Sleeve," and "tells [his brother's] story for him because he can't," Neugeboren said he also attempts to alleviate common misconceptions concerning the mentally ill.

Neugeboren said he crafted his story by beginning with the things he remembered most, but had to "work through some painful memories" in order to write about them clearly.

He said many people find it "glamorous

Senate supports creating learning resources center

By MICHAEL R. LINSKEY
Collegian Staff

The Faculty Senate yesterday supported the creation of a Learning Resources Center and also agreed to change several academic regulations to improve undergraduate retention and academic success.

Speaking before 61 senators, Provost Glen Gordon noted that many other universities have Learning Resources Centers to assist with "computer instruction and other services," which he feels the University of Massachusetts should have too.

"This is not merely a retention activity, but a center we're attempting to create to assist students in the mastery of material regardless of academic status," he said. "i do believe the creation of this center will be a great first step to improve the panoply of services we provide our students, and I urge you to support it."

The senate eventually did so, but not before several senators suggested the administration's recent admissions policies made such a center necessary. Robert Wilson, professor of hotel, restaurant and travel administration, seemed to speak for this faction when he criticized both admissions policies and faculty reluctance to instruct incoming freshmen.

"We have heard today that steps are being taken to improve the quality of the students coming in; we feel that is one of the problems that is manifesting itself," he said. "But we also feel there is a trend among faculty within departments to choose to teach senior-level courses, graduate courses and upper-level courses, but not freshman courses. The faculty needs to make a commitment to improving the quality of education by having more senior-level faculty teaching more freshman and sophomore-level courses."

Gordon echoed Wilson by saying, "The single factor that creates more of our retention problems than any other is the [quality of] students we admit." Other senators, such as Professor Brian W. O'Connor of Biology, conceded this point but felt a learning center was still a valuable proposal.

"We're not getting the caliber of students we've had in the past, but we've still got to deal with them," he said. "We're not getting what we used to get, but on the other hand, the students that are having trouble are seeking help. I find that encouraging, and feel a learning center is a step in the right direction."

The proposal was unanimously accepted.

In other news, the senate endorsed a motion moving the last day of the Undergraduate Withdrawal Period from the 28th day of the semester to the mid-semester date.

The senate also supported a motion authorizing academic departments to transfer certain students into "a lower or higher level course in the same sequence" to better serve their academic needs.

'Sexpert' bursts with information on risk-free fun

By MELANIE DESILVA
Collegian Staff

"Am I right to assume that you are all the sex maniacs in western Massachusetts?" Susan Bright asked a predominantly female audience at the beginning of a Smith College lecture this week, entitled Safe Sex for Sex Maniacs.

With the spread of AIDS and an increase in other STD's, sex education has become a national issue, as colleges and universities repeatedly teach students how to put a condom on a banana and how to use dental dams.

Yet even with the extreme risk involved in having sex these days, students are failing to take universal precautions, unconvinced that safe sex is compatible with an intense sexual experience, according to Bright, the author of "Susie Sexpert's Lesbian Sex World" and "Susie Bright's Sexual Reality: A Virtual Sex World Reality."

Speaking to over 300 people Wednesday night, Susan "Sexpert" Bright addressed why current safe sex education has been ineffective and explained how students can "get off and be totally safe."

"Doctors are interested in prolonging your life. I also have that same interest. I have an interest in saving your sex life and prolonging your sexual satisfaction," Bright said, eliciting hoots and raucous applause from audience members.

With little scientific data available for women, and with safety information constantly being revised, safe sex is more complex than educators often lead people to believe, according to Bright.

"We have to deal with changing information and the fact that the information is not certain," Bright said. "It sucks that all safe sex information is focused on men. With women we have no answers, no statistics."

After showing a safe sex video targeting lesbians, called "Current Flow," Bright engaged the audience, accumulating a list of reasons why the public service announcement was effective.

The video, featuring two women making love safely, was described as "creative, imaginative, and fun."

Emphasizing the importance of masturbation, Bright encouraged people to explore their "erotic identity," and to experiment with "the accessories that are out there that make you hot."

Panel confronts misconceptions of ethnic groups

By ANN MARIE NEAL
Collegian Staff

"Issues Concerning People of African Descent on the UMass Campus" was the title of the Cape Verdean Student Alliance's panel discussion last night.

The discussion was conducted by eight UMass students, and moderated by Sid Ferreira, academic adviser for the Collegiate Committee for the Education of Black and other Minority Students.

The panel focused on problems confronting ethnic groups on campus, and the diversity of African and African-descended ethnic groups at the University.

"A part of the problem is that there is a small percentage of us here, and oftentimes that results in misconceptions of Cape Verdeans," Anna Lisa, a Cape Verdean student, said.

"There's a misconception, because it's believed that we don't associate ourselves with African Americans, but that's not true. We just have a lot of pride in ourselves," she said.

Justin Baty, a Native American student, said, "There's also a small percentage of us here. The images of Native American men and women are often distorted, and we need to re-educate ourselves. We need to do it now and we need to do it here."

Among the panelist were two Africans: Muse Woods and Christine Harmon.

Woods said, "The biggest problem is that not many individuals go to functions in support of each other. The idea that we're all Black and the same is a part of the problem, and we within ourselves need to address that issue."

Rob Venator, a Latino, and Renaita Harrison, a Jamaican, both said, "I don't want to speak for my entire race, so I'll speak for myself."

"I would allude to students about the reality on this campus not being addressed," Venator said. "We need to break the barriers," Woods added.

Penny Cameron, a freshman on the panel, arrived late, but had much to say to the audience of about 30.

"Charity begins at home, and the campus powers are trying to pit us against each other. We can see it here just look around at all the empty seats that should be filled," Cameron said.

"People often feel they need to get theirs, but we need to support each other, while remembering that no one said money will give you happiness and pride," she said.

The discussion ended with an agreement, by the audience and the panelists to plan, publicize and support programs held within each cultural group.

A need was recognized to begin a process of examining themselves for hidden stereotypes and misconceptions that have no bearing on reality.

Greek speaks on Balkan crisis

Former U.N. delegate addresses violence, nationalism

By BRIAN C. O'NEILL
Collegian Correspondent

Greek Consul Theodore Passase spoke about Greece and its role in the Balkan crisis to the UMass community last night as part of a celebration of Greek Independence Day.

Passase, a 1991-92 member of the Greek delegation at the 46th and 47th General Assembly of the United Nations, said decisive action must be taken to end the conflict in the former Yugoslavia. "The European Community must act quickly in establishing the Vance-Owen plan before it's too late," he said.

The Vance-Owen plan prescribes the division of the former Yugoslavia into separate Serbian, Croatian and Muslim territories as a way to end fighting between these factions, and was drafted by U.N. officials.

"The Balkans have often been described as the powder keg of Europe. . . the Vance-Owen plan is a well-drafted plan," he said.

He said Eastern Europe has been having difficulty in making the transition to democracy. "Market economics have proved painful," he said.

"There are two spirits in Europe: one working for boundaries, the other working for unification. . . one moving toward the 19th-century ideals and the other working toward the 20th century," he said.

Addressing debates in Macedonia, a region where some parts of the population feel an allegiance to Yugoslavia and others to Greece, Passase said the term "Macedonia" was really created by Titoist, Stalinist ideals. "In talking about the Macedonia question, before 1944 there was no mention of Macedonia on maps. They were considered Greeks."

Passase said historically Macedonians are Greeks, in contrast to one audience's members belief that Macedonia is a separate state with its own identity. Passase backed up his claim by reading the United Nation's definition that Macedonia is part of the former Yugoslavia.

In closing Passase said, "The situation in Bosnia is a tragedy." The situation in Yugoslavia could pose a problem if embargos are lifted causing the fighting in Bosnia to spill out into neighboring countries.

Passase said the Greeks want a peaceful solution to the crisis in the Balkans, "The Greek government believes the plans for ending the crisis should be intensified."

The celebration of Greek Independence day continued with a reception in his Passase's honor.

10k road race set to benefit needy children

By MARTI SHAW
and ELAINE McBEE
Collegian Correspondents

Once a year, members of the University of Massachusetts campus community have the opportunity to trade their winter boots for jogging shoes and help homeless and abused children at the same time.

Last year the University's Newman Center, which sponsors the annual benefit "Run for Runaways," was able to raise $3,000 for the Covenant House in New York.

The Covenant House assists children when they are abused at home or have run away from home.

At the Covenant House, counselors help talk about children's problems. When they arrive, they are given a hot meal, clean clothes and a warm bed.

The Run for Runaways is a 10-kilometer (6.2 mile) road race, sponsored by Pi Kappa Alpha Fraternity and the Newman Center. All proceeds from this event are donated to the Covenant House.

UMass student Deb Janik, who is a volunteer to recruit students to run in the event, said "the homeless situation for the youths is pretty bad."

She said there are a lot of runaways throughout the country, and the Covenant House offers support at a time when they may not receive attention from their parents.

Although the event was rained on last year, sponsors say they hope to exceed the 275 runners that registered last year with at least 300 registrants this year.

This is the first week of registration, and so far 50 people have signed up. Few sign-ups are expected the first week, but generally pick up the second week when applications are returned, organizers said.

Giving some credit to the homeless

By KENDRA WILLETT
Collegian Staff

For college students across the nation the motto created by American Express, "Never leave home without it," will be even more important during the next few weeks.

The American Express credit card company has joined with a volunteer organization called Share Our Strength in an effort to raise money to benefit homeless shelters across the county.

Every time a college student makes a purchase with his American Express credit card, regardless of amount, the company will donate approximately nine cents to SOS.

The campaign "Million Meals" will run from March 15 through April 30. American Express and SOS say it should raise at least $90,000.

Cristine Parker, a senior at George Washington University who represents SOS in the campaign, and Andrew Seibert, senior manager in charge of student cards for American Express, said they see a serious need to organize events which will help the homeless.

Parker said SOS deals with many organizations, and encourages them to participate in programs that will raise money, rather than just make donations of money.

"The SOS group is more of a middle man than anything else," Parker said. "We ask for donations of effort and time from organizations, not checks."

Artists, chefs and authors are all examples of professionals who donate their works and time, Parker said.

The organizers said the main goal of the campaign is now to get college students involved.

to look through a window and see the hell of someone else's life." He said he therefore tries to "de-romanticize" his autobiographies.

Gaines said writing a memoir requires complete honesty as well as the intelligence to articulate what was uncovered. She said she views her writing as a learning experience which "added another layer" to her personal knowledge.

Gaines, a reporter for the Washington Post and National Public Radio, won the National Association of Black Journalists Award for her Post story "Tough Boyz."

During the question-and-answer period, the panel discussed the potential for emotionally hurting people by what they reveal in their memoirs, and agreed that the truth should always be told. "Why tell the story if you don't tell it all," Neugeboren said.

The afternoon conference was entitled "Money: Supporting Your Habits." The panel consisted of five authors and journalists, who spoke on financing book projects.

The authors said that although advances from editors appear large, often more than $100,000, the money must last two or three years, and is eaten up by research expenses, taxes and agent's fees. The authors said they all took part-time jobs to stay afloat while working on their books.

The panelists were Walt Harrington, who wrote "Crossings: A White Man's Journey Into Black America," Henry "Buzzy" Bissinger, who won the Pulitzer Prize for investigative reporting, and authored "Friday Night Lights," Cynthia Gorney, a Washington Post reporter who is writing a history of the American abortion conflict, and Ted Conover, who is the author of "Coyotes," "Rolling Nowhere," and "Whiteout."

"You men need to buy a whole bunch of brands [of condoms] and start wanking off, and see what feels good," Bright said. "Women, you need to start putting things in and around your pussy and see what it feels like."

Bright displayed and demonstrated dental dams, latex gloves, dildos and even a new sex device called a thigh harness. Holding a dildo, the harness straps around the thigh for interesting and creative sex between partners.

Audience reaction to the lecture and presentation was positive, as interviewers praised Bright for her realistic approach to promoting safe lesbian and straight sex.

"I thought it was excellent. I like the fact that she had a really human approach to it," UMass undergraduate Kelly Hayes said.

"She brought up stuff that people don't usually bring up. She's realistic," said Meg Rosser, also a UMass student.

"We are trying to focus on college students because we know homelessness and poverty are issues they are concerned with." Seibert said. "The easiest way for a student to help out is to use his card."

SOS has always tried new and different strategies for raising money, Parker said.

For instance, the organization urges restaurants and other food organizations to deliver their daily leftovers to nearby shelters and soup kitchens.

This is not the first time that Share Our Strength and American Express have teamed up. Every year, American Express sponsors an event called Taste of the Nation.

The events consist of a series of food and wine tasting parties across the country, and now constitute one of the largest nationwide benefits for hunger relief.

According to both Parker and Seibert, the campaign will be advertised on over 300 college campuses across the United States.

"Students need to keep in mind that this is only a short period of time, so they must use their cards." Parker said.

Our wacko talks with Waco's wacko: hangin' with Koresh

Michael
MORRISSEY

WACO, Texas — Some students traveled to Cancun for spring break, while others took off for Florida. There were even a few of my comrades who went to the West Coast for some fun in the sun, but for my break, I was on a mission.

I went down to the land of cowboys and cowpokes to visit the wacko from Waco, that krazy killer, David "Kooky" Koresh. In my 10-day stay, I was able to talk at great length with Koresh and his clan of the Branch Davidians, who have killed four U.S. marshals during the 20-day standoff in Waco. The following is an exclusive interview with "Kriminal" Koresh.

Michael Morrissey: Were you aware that you have more than one thing in common with Charles Manson (of Helter Skelter fame)? Both of you are failed musicians, and he even put out an album. Did you know this?

David Koresh: As the Bible states, I had a higher calling during my musical career. I felt I had a much better chance of gaining fame and fortune through brainwashing legions of naive religious zealots.

MM: There has been much written about the Branch Davidians, a group splintered from the Seventh Day Adventists, and their persuasive way of recruiting. There are reports you have violated many laws in building such a large following, and that you have a personal vendetta against this religion.

DK: As the Lord has stated through the alignment of Ursa Major and the Big Dipper, all heretics will be blown up with an anti-tank missile in the very near future. This applies especially to the Seventh Day Adventists, who will be killed instead with a fully automatic machine gun.

MM: You certainly have amassed a large arsenal of weapons in the span of a few short years. How have you accomplished this and what do you plan to do with these weapons?

DK: As the moon's cycle, and the lack of Io, Jupiter's innermost moon, being seen in the Texas sky in the last week of February have clearly explained to me, we have accumulated as much as many Third World countries and it was time to act. Since these countries have taken on holy wars for their false gods, we in the compound feel it will soon be time for us to strike.

MM: Has anyone ever told you you bear a striking resemblance to Howard Stern?

DK: In dealing with the media, he has taught me a lot.

MM: Do you really believe yourself to be the second coming of Jesus Christ?

DK: As the book of Revelation has stated in many forms, the son of God will come down upon Earth, have sex with all of his female followers, arm his followers with illegal guns and weapons, and open fire on any law enforcement agents who come to the temple with a search warrant.

MM: Really?! I must have missed Sunday School the week that was taught. Anyway, I would like to ask you: what is it like being Jesus Christ?

DK: Like Brigham Young once stated, it's not as tough as one might think. You take a few dumb Southerners, susceptible for brainwashing, move to a town where religion is a big deal, take the outskirts of a town and build an impervious fort with the labor of these dummies, and move slowly but surely from religion to cult, and before you know it, you're God.

MM: How much longer do you think you will stay here, and do you think think you will ever be arrested, caught or killed?

DK: Like Orson Welles clearly stated, "We will brainwash no mind before its time," and we will cross no police line before its time, either. When the blue moon turns red and the Bible burns up in my hand, I'll run for the first flight to Rio de Janiero.

Altering our natural world

Gary
DEANE

Humankind has the power to alter the world like no other living creature before it.

Since the beginnings of life, the environment has shaped animals and plants, causing them to adapt to their surroundings. Recently we have discovered the power to shape and adapt that environment, paving highways, drilling for oil, constructing tremendous dams and toying with radioactivity. We have the power to chill our planet with the explosive and final orgasm of science.

There is a reason to fear for the safety of American wilderness. The symbiotic balance of nature has too long been mutilated and neglected. Man's assaults upon the environment, the continuous contamination of the air, earth, rivers and sea may eventually quiet the spring, the string of smothering pollutants finally rides the food chain to its miserable, somber death.

Entire species are vanishing all over the earth; we are numb to the statistics. But springtime in New England will present subtle changes as well. A few less fish in slightly more acidic ponds. A few less birds have nests in the handful of remaining elms. A few more deer are forced into less woods to live. A few more startling reports about how oil has turned a wildlife haven into a shiny, blackened toilet.

But in the history of life on Earth, this is all happening in but a flash of time, and we may buckle under the enormous cancer of our past and present mistakes.

For thousands of generations humans survived by planting crops using simple but effective methods. Do we know why we must blanket our crops with chemical sprays, infested by insects brought from across the oceans which thrive upon the "cash crops" squeezed into meager parcels of land?

For millions of years the Colorado River has carved by inches Earth's geological past and laid it upon a single page. Dams mar that landscape now, and have sunk beautiful treasure under patient waters. The oceans are sick; 17,000 U.S. bodies of water remain heavily polluted, and our skies are breaking, full of vicious holes and accumulating harm.

The war between the ecosphere and technosphere renders us vulnerable as well. Our milk is tainted, our fruits poisoned. Our friends and relatives battle cancer, and we wonder why God would afflict sickness upon us.

Science spends millions on new chemicals and cures, waging a battle of attrition with itself. We are told to think that a bottle of suntan lotion actually lessens the harm of a diminishing ozone layer.

Spring will cast its warmth upon our towns. The melted mountain snow will fill the rivers and soak the virile plains. Birds will sing their radiant chorus, wild flowers will laugh and greet diligent bees. The wooded beauty of the trees will spread its thick green canopy over the spacious open woods.

The seasons supplant one another without question, obligated to churn the deliberate cycle of nature. Yet many people observe the advance of seasons from the protection of the sidewalk, the sanctuary of a car or the impregnable office chair.

We must all pass the barrier between us and it; step off the sidewalk and onto the Robert Frost Trail; spend a night near the Quabbin; explore the Holyoke Range. In order to try to change it all, you must be among the wild things and breathe its air.

It still looks a lot like Christmas

Matt
VAUTOUR

I think I speak for a large portion of the population when I ask:

"Where is global warming when we really need it?"

This is ridiculous. The snow that the winter of 1992-93 has dumped on this area has been enough for three winters. Almost all of Massachusetts has had record amounts of snow accumulation over this winter.

Elementary schools as far south as Georgia (the Peach State!) had school cancellations due to the white stuff. All things that could only happen when hell froze over can't be far from occurring. Are we ever going to see a robin or a crocus?

I think God misunderstood me. When I asked for snow for Christmas, I only meant snow on Christmas. We've gotten the weekly subscription.

Well, baseball fans, a sports enthusiast friend of mine has informed me that unless we have a warm spell with a far-reaching snow-melting capacity, the Red Sox and Minutemen may not play their first home games until June. Can you say double-headers? So much for intramural softball.

Two of the most popular "spring" break activities are going to Florida or going skiing. (I spent it shoveling a tunnel through my walkway.) Who would have ever thought that spring break '93 would provide students the opportunity to do both. I did a double take at seeing lift tickets that said Daytona and Orlando.

St. Patrick's Day, the pride of the Irish. Nothing could stop this parade from happening right? Wrong. The wearing of the green was replaced by the shoveling of the white.

I'm suing Jack Frost and Old Man Winter for the price of my spring wardrobe (anybody who's seen my clothes knows that I don't stand to make much) because at this rate it's not going to get much use.

I'm ready to trade my work boots for sandals and my ski jacket for short sleeves. Northeast is just screaming for beach volleyball.

We've been teased all too often with brief warm spells only to find an inch on the ground two days later.

Is Florida State still accepting applications for the fall semester? I could go for some year-round sun.

Women's movement only whines

I'm a thoroughly disgusted, utterly disappointed White male at UMass. Every day I try to take the women's movement seriously. I struggle with my soul, telling myself again and again, "Rush Limbaugh is wrong, they aren't a bunch of lesbian Nazis." Today, I give up the fight.

The women's movement is made up of extremists, and a lot of whiny, pathetic little girls. They refuse to take responsibility for their situation, they deliberately misinterpret and misrepresent statistics, they fill in the holes of their weak rhetoric with baseless criticism of men.

Take the women who attended Gloria Steinem's talk. They left with big smiles on their faces, saying, "Gloria gave me self-esteem, Gloria gave me self-authority, Gloria gave me my rage." Obviously, they feel they need something to identify with. They want something to "rage" at, and Gloria hands them men on a platter. These girls miss the point. The very words "self-esteem" imply that it comes from within.

Women want to be taken seriously, but they give men no reason to take them seriously. Sontag, Faludi, Steinem, Wolfe. . . none of them have a clue. They have the most twisted views of the world that I have ever had the displeasure to read. The women's movement has nothing useful to offer society. Granted they have (on occasion) brought up useful criticisms, but they have these crazed, completely out-to-lunch solutions. Men are raping women and not doing enough time for it; this is a valid social problem. The women, however, have blown the whole thing completely out of proportion. Instead of writing to politicians and lobbying for stricter sentences, they sit around and whine. They make up imaginary situations, like "date rape," and attempt to align themselves "oppressed women all over the world."

They need to get in touch with reality. The reason men (and I'm sure the majority of professional women) don't take them seriously is because they are completely out of touch.

Finalist leaves student enraged

After hearing the presentation on multicultural issues by Dr. Luis M. Proenza, finalist for chancellor of this university, I felt a lasting sense of rage. Despite the favorable comments by (check this) Mark Kenen [Collegian, March 22], a member of the search committee, I was utterly disappointed with this candidate.

There are three salient ideas from his question and answer session that illustrate my opinion. First, he stressed the idea of development because at this moment, according to him, there are not enough qualified minorities for jobs out there. As he was saying this, so much anger built up inside me. He did not focus specifically on students on this campus and worst of all, he did not even realize what the real issue is. There are plenty of qualified candidates out there. We are just not given equal opportunities to go for jobs we deserve. I know this through my parents' experiences. I know this through the recurrent experiences of the same problem of other minorities. For how many generations will this last? We need a chancellor who can address these and other related issues now.

It is even more unbelievable that this was not the only issue he was weak on. Proenza could not adequately answer questions directed to him about how he has dealt with the issues of homophobia and hate crimes. In his answer to homophobia, he said simply that he has a gay friend with whom he has worked. Just because he knows somebody is gay does not mean he has consciousness of the problem of homophobia. His answer showed that he was avoiding the question. In relation to hate crimes, he said that he had no prior experience in implementing programs dealing with this issue. If he has had no prior experience in developing programs concerning this issue and lack of awareness and sensitivity to homophobia and economic oppression of minorities, than he has no business being here.

I was so upset that a man this out of touch with reality could be selected as a finalist for such a high office as chancellor. Additionally, I was alarmed that there were hardly any students at this open forum because the decision of who becomes chancellor will greatly impact their lives.

It is important that students attend all the finalists' presentations. I am only one student whose opinions about this candidate may or may not reflect others' opinions. The point is that if more students attend, fill out and send in the evaluation forms available during these open forums, the selection committee will have a better idea of who the students want as chancellor. There will be a better chance that a chancellor who reflects, understands and takes actions about the issues concerning the students and the community will be hired.

League hits a home run this week on HSCN

By EDWARD W. HUMPHRIES
Collegian Correspondent

Well UMass, welcome back from a very exciting spring break, rocked by the blizzard of '93. For the masses of you snowbound in the terminal terminals of Logan Airport, have heart, for the summer of '93 is approaching final descent.

In anticipation of this upcoming summer of blockbusters, headlining Steven Spielberg's dino-epic Jurassic Park and Arnold Schwarzenegger's turn as The Last Action Hero, HSCN has stockpiled a host of hits from summers past including last year's A League of Their Own.

For those viewers with more critically acclaimed tastes, HSCN aspires to whet your appetites with such directorial standouts as Robert Altman's *M*A*S*H*, Roman Polanski's gripping Rosemary's Baby and the late John Huston's Prizzi's Honor. So keep the thesis paper on standby and enjoy this week's slate of cinema.

Crazy People — Proving too effectively that there can be truth in advertising, this film is aptly titled, for whoever executed this dreadful comedy should be committed. Dudley Moore, stepping closer and closer to relative obscurity with each successive film misstep, plays an ad man wrongly institutionalized by pal Paul Reiser after seriously pushing a truth-in-advertising campaign. On the inside, Moore meets and romances Darryl Hannah (looking seriously lost!) who helps him to launch his "innovative" campaign against his previous employers. It's a funny concept with one slight problem, most of today's ads reveal more wit in 30 seconds than in this film's entire running time. D

Where the Day Takes You — Although sporting a cast list that plays like a Who's Who to young Hollywood, this relatively small film remained virtually ignored last fall among such heavyweight contenders as Hero and Dracula. Too bad, because it's worth catching this realistic portrayal of a group of homeless youths who become their own surrogate family amidst the chaos of the streets. Good performances by Dermot Mulroney as the group's leader and Twin Peaks vets Kyle MacLachlan and Lara Flynn Boyle help keep the film from sinking into heavy-handed melodrama. B

Alien — Having inspired a string of sub-par clones, this taut sci-fi thriller from 1979 stands as a classic. Director Ridley Scott tells the story of the doomed inhabitants of a planetary mining cruiser who unwittingly invite a parasitic alien aboard. Scott bathes this film in rich visuals and through tight camera shots manages to convey an atmosphere of imminent doom. Sigourney Weaver creates a strong and believable Chief Warrant Officer Ripley and John Hurt, Harry Dean Stanton and Yaphet Kotto earn merit as the passengers in this interstellar nightmare. A-

Black Moon Rising — No, this isn't the documentary on 70's rock group Creedence Clearwater Revival, but rather a mismatched concoction of action and sci-fi genres from the usually able hands of director John Carpenter (Halloween, Starman). Unfortunately Carpenter stumbles here in this lackluster adventure starring Tommy Lee Jones as an ace thief who is hired to heist a prototype supercar containing valuable computer disks. Everyone in this film appears lost, including T2's pumped-up heroine Linda Hamilton. Only veteran B-movie bad guy Robert Vaughn appears at home here, but then he is used to such drivel. C-

Deep Star Six — Horror director Sean Cunningham (Friday the 13th) attempted to kick off an underwater monster movie revival back in 1989 with this waterlogged thriller, but his ideas submerge and never come up for air. Featuring the worst rubber-suited monster in recent years, this film lacks what all horror films hold intrinsic — scares. Among the very few points of interest here, all you "My Two Dads" fans can thrill to star Greg Evigan's battle against a homicidal prehistoric shrimp cocktail. D-

A League of Their Own — Although overtly sentimental in its finale and hampered by an annoying framing device, this nostalgic look at the All-American Woman's Baseball League during the WWII years manages to be both sweet and funny and an enormous crowd pleaser. Penny Marshall generated good performances from the vast ensemble cast, with Geena Davis, Lori Petty and a hilariously sarcastic John Lovitz as the standouts. Despite limited screen time, Tom Hanks bids to steal the show. B+

The Naked Gun 2 1/2 — Lt. Detective Frank Drebin is back, this time taking Washington by storm as he inadvertantly foils a potential environmental disaster masterminded by . . . Robert Goulet. And thus begins another chapter in this Zucker Brothers spoof of bad police dramas brimming with sight gags and bad puns aplenty. Taking aim at the larger than life conventions of Hollywood crime drama the Zucker's score big laughs in this sequel to 1988's The Naked Gun. Priscilla Presley and O.J. Simpson as the hapless Nordberg return

Latest sounds from the racks

By ADAM GOULSTON
Collegian Correspondent

If you've ever had the privilege of shopping at Nuggets' used records in Boston's Kenmore Square, you're probably aware of their section in the back corner of the store where all the CD's are two bucks and the tapes are one buck. There are racks of the stuff. This is everything they couldn't sell at their regular already low prices.

With the exception of a few gems, the albums on the bargain racks are failures, bands destined to ride the two dollar shelves because they are dull, mismanaged or just not talented. Icy Blue and AR Kane are two of the artists that pop into my head.

With this in mind, here's the story on some new (or pretty new) releases which may be overlooked and justifiably so (rated on a scale of 0-5 bulbs in honor of spring) but as in the case of the Nuggets racks, there is usually a gem.

Sand Rubies
Sand Rubies
Atlas

David Slutes and Rick Hopkins deliver some nice acoustic-driven roots rock on the Sand Rubies self-titled debut. The duo achieve a nice harmony on 11 lengthy tunes. "Interstate" is a tasteful Neil Young cover and "Hit the Brakes (at the Pearly Gates)" deserves mention for its raunchy deviation from the other relatively subdued tracks.

Nearly 60 minutes may be a bit presumptuous for a debut album but it's pretty pleasant listening. 2 1/2 bulbs

Numb
Hammerbox
A&M Records

Hammerbox are from Seattle, but they are not just another Seattle grunge band. Lead singer Carrie Akre lends a mighty throat to some mighty tracks. Akre can growl with the best of them and power a song which may otherwise be only mediocre, such as "Blur." Her duet with drummer David Bosch also shines as Akre begins at his subdued level before exploring the astronomically high and grating reaches of her range.

Numb has that nice polished grunge sound which a slick production job can lend. It accompanies Akre beautifully and enhances guitarist Harris Thurmond's occasional journeys into distortion. Some songs are a bit repetitious but damn can Carrie sing!

Intuition tells me they put on a great stage show. See them and you'll probably get the privilege of Carrie making your ears bleed in a way the CD just can't. 3 1/2 bulbs

Eastwood ready for Oscar win

Unforgiven auteur leads the pack for Best Director

By JON LUPO
Collegian Staff

This is the fifth in a six-part series highlighting the major nominees for the 1992 Academy Awards, which will be presented on March 29.

When it comes to Best Director, there is usually a lot of talk over omissions and inclusions. This year is no exception. With A Few Good Men garnering a Best Picture nomination and not a Best Director nod for Rob Reiner, it is one of the most noticeable (but not necessarily debatable) exclusions. Along with Martin Brest's surprise nomination for Scent of A Woman, handicapping the Best Director race has become a question — like all Oscar races sooner or later — of politics.

COURTESY WARNER BROS.
Clint Eastwood, seen here in 1990's "The Rookie," is nominated for Best Actor and Best Director for this year's "Unforgiven."

Where, pray tell, is Spike Lee among the nominees? Nowhere. The Malcolm X brush-off is never more notoriously glaring than it is here. Lee had to battle a tight-fisted Warner Bros., a global production and bad press from all sides and still came out with one the finest, most laudable films of 1992. If that's not worth at least an Oscar nomination, then what is? And is someone going to tell me that Martin Brest did a better directing job in Scent of A Woman than Spike Lee did in Malcolm X? Anyone?

As for the other "controversy," Reiner does have some reason to whine about his non-nomination. Did the Best Picture nominee direct itself? Certainly not. But there's nothing striking about the direction of A Few Good Men to deem it "outstanding." At best it's a credible, efficient job — and nothing a half a dozen other directors couldn't have done just as well.

The inclusion of Robert Altman for The Player was nice, but it seemed more an action of throwing the acclaimed film a bone than an act of honoring Altman's directing talents. The big kiss-off of Malcolm X and The Player point to how clueless the Academy really is — and how blind it is to quality directing.

James Ivory, nominated for Howards End, doesn't stand a chance. However textured and fluid the directing was, he's bound to be lost in the shuffle. Ivory is one of the most consistently polished directors and deserves something, but it won't be a gold statuette.

1992 should be crowned the Year of Clint. Eastwood pretty much has this award sewn up — he was given the Director's Guild nod, which is considered an almost foolproof indicator of an Oscar in this category. I've been critical of Eastwood's acting in Unforgiven, but his directing work was much more far-reaching and complex. He's gonna get it, but my choice is . . .

. . . Neil Jordan for The Crying Game. Regardless of the fact that he also wrote the script, his directing work in this truly mesmerizing film was key to the film's success. His expert fusing of the IRA terrorist subplot, the complicated romance and his subtle use of irony made for a rich and intricate film. Jordan may go home empty-handed (at least for this award), but long after Unforgiven gathers dust on the "Oscar Winners" shelf at the video store, Jordan's unique vision will live on.

Well, Monday's the big day and the last installment of this seemingly endless series. I'll take a look at the biggie, Best Picture — and offer my takes on some of the other categories and the Awards telecast as a whole.

Sky Blues
Captain Howdy Records

Sky Blues' press release boasts of a poll of high school students in which the kids ranked Sky Blues between Led Zeppelin and Guns n' Roses as their favorite group. Need I say anymore? Their tracks are written OK but Marc Ian Keslow's rock-star voice gets to be a bore. They'd probably do best sticking with the high school market. 1 bulb

Moth Macabre
Moth Macabre
Interscope Records

Their name conjured up images of a My Bloody Valentine-esque ethereal soundwave group. Wishful thinking. Moth Macabre is anything but ethereal. Macabre defined is "gruesome or suggesting death." Well...they are kind of gruesome. "Glass Eye" is a song about hurting oneself...nice. This debut has a few positive attributes. 1) A male-female duet formula which works well when it's used. 2) A song about vowels, "AEIOU." 3) Cool bug pictures. 4) Songs which actually seem to be about something. Moth were probably signed because the label hadn't met their "alternative" quota. Buy it used and cheap, otherwise skip it. 2 bulbs.

for another round of madcap antics. B+

Radio Flyer — Big-budget director Richard Donner (Lethal Weapon, Superman) working from a script by David Mickey Evans takes time out from extravagant action pieces to tell this tale of two brothers who resort to their imagination to escape the abuses of their all-too-real stepfather. Though oft-pre-empted by studio heads and poorly received by audience and critics alike, this film is a small, sentimental drama which gives caution to a very serious subject while reveling in the delights and fears of childhood. Elijah Wood and Joseph Mazzello convincingly plat the beleaguered brothers who rely on their fantasy world and their friendship to survive and Tom Hanks is good in an unbilled role as the film's narrator who allows this wondrous tale to be told. B+

Also playing this week but not reviewed are Ghostbusters, Ferris Bueller's Day Off, Compromising Positions, Afraid of the Dark, The Big Chill, Elephant Man, Incident at Ogalla, Little Darlings and Modern Girls.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Capitalize on your specialized knowledge to achieve greater financial security. New career vistas are opening up. Get your affairs in order. Watch out for mistakes in paperwork.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): An audience could prove difficult today. Keep your composure while waiting in the wings and be cooperative. Taking better care of yourself will prevent sickness and help to make you a happier person.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): A home beautification project enjoys favorable influences. Focus on both promoting family ties and and romantic ardor. A secret plan is truly inspired. Anticipate thrills and chills in love.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): A financial crossroads could be hazardous. Pay bills promptly. Be careful not to trip yourself up or divulge secrets. Choose your words very carefully. Curl up with a good book tonight.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Selfish interests could drive you and a loved one apart. Wrong impressions are possible. It is pull, not push, that will get a project moving today. Deal with challenges in a responsible manner.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): You are particularly good with money now. A public appearance you make today will pay off handsomely. Exemplify the spirit of sharing this evening.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Present your ideas behind closed doors and you will get great results. Although good buys are available, watch out for red tape and fine print. Meet your family responsibilities with good grace.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Other people will follow your lead with enthusiasm today. News from afar or a step taken toward a long-range goal lifts your spirits sky high. Update your wardrobe and hairstyle as soon as you can.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Think twice before spending more than you can afford. In business matters, bow to an expert's opinion. You cannot reach the mountaintop through half-hearted efforts.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Stay on your toes! Business opportunities abound. Spending less money is the way to get out of a financial rut. Learn to compromise.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Do not let irritable people or frequent interruptions distract you from your objective. Settle a financial matter once and for all. Business comes before pleasure this evening.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Decide how to handle a problem only after consulting your mate or partner. A romantic relationship enjoys highly favorable influences over the next few days.

Registration continues up to the time of the race, although the fee goes up from $5 to $7 on the day of the race.

Participants often include teachers and graduate students.

Local businesses sponsoring the race include the Sub, Friendly's restaurant, Pizza Hut, Rafters and many others.

This year the Run for Runaways is on the site of UMass Alumni Stadium Track. It is scheduled for Saturday, April 3. For runners it begins at 10 a.m., and walkers at 9:30 a.m. Registration is held on the Campus Center Concourse between March 22 and 26 and March 29 and April 3.

Collegian correspondents Luis Quinones and Ruben Gonzalez also contributed to this report.

The newspaper is one of the main selling points of the high school, which many consider the worst of the three public high schools in Springfield, Smist said. The paper has received the mayor's trophy for the best high school newspaper in Springfield for the past five years.

"They're a very positive group in as negative a situation, as far as education goes, as you can get," Smist said.

Chantell Branch, a senior at Commerce High, worked with a group of five people to report on "pizza and professors night." She said it is an event sponsored by the honors program at the University and only open to honors students.

"I'm having a great time," Branch said. "I've never experienced anything like being in a newspaper office before."

Denise Truchly, a reporter for the school paper, said, "It's a good learning experience because a lot of people here have never experienced getting information and writing stories."

Truchly said her group researched the Black Mass Communications Project upcoming Funk-A-Thon. Ricky McKenzie, who worked on the story, called it "a very Black experience."

"It was positive. There were good images of Black people in the office," McKenzie said.

McKenzie is the Black affairs editor for the school paper. He said he hopes to come to the University next year and work on the paper.

The students were asked to take the stories back to school with them to work on and send by fax back to the Collegian where they will be edited and possibly used at a later date.

The students were treated to lunch at the Hatch and received a tour of the WMUA studio. They also visited the arcade and the University store.

ANNOUNCEMENT OF AWARD RECIPIENTS

The Chancellor's Commission in Civility in Human Relations is pleased to announce funding of the following six exceptional proposals in response to its recent Request for Proposals. A Joint Review Committee and the Chancellor's Multicultural Advisory Board selected these six from a total of thirty-eight proposals which were received.

"Multicultural Forum and Discussion Series," an educational program aimed at promoting dialogue between AFSCME Local 1776 stewards and officers, Affirmative Action and Equal Opportunity Office staff, employees of color, female employees, representatives of several campus-wide advocacy groups and University managers. The proposal was jointly submitted by Joseph Connolly on behalf of the University of Massachusetts Labor/Management Workplace Education Program staff, the Local 1776 Stewards Council and Local 1776 Officers.

"Toward a New Pedagogy of Multicultural Studies," a proposal for two symposia which will focus on developing new pedagogies for the teaching of multicultural fluency. This proposal was jointly submitted by Nicholas Bromell, English, and Esther Terry, Afro-American Studies.

"Lecture by Paul Parks," a presentation by a member of an all-black U.S. Army unit which participated in the liberation of prisoners from Nazi death camps. The Hillel Black/Jewish Relations Committee, the Black Mass Communications Project (BMCP) and the Office of Third World Affairs jointly developed this proposal.

"Minority Leadership Forum," a program involving several faculty whose purpose is to introduce students to minority role models for leadership and explore the interaction of race and culture with leadership styles. This proposal was submitted by Charlena Seymour, Communications Disorders.

"Women of Color Support Group," a spring semester program under the direction of the Counseling Program of the Everywomen's Center (EWC) aimed at engaging women of color from diverse racial and ethnic backgrounds. Carol Wallace, Director, EWC and Heyda Martinez, Coordinator of Counseling Services, EWC submitted this proposal.

"Taking a Stand," and educational program to be initiated in the Northeast/Sylvan Residential Area which combines a poster series regarding issues of oppression and the role of "allies" with residentially-based public forums and workshops. The proposal was submitted by Carol Carlson, Residence Director, Crabtree Cluster, and John Orwat, Assistant Residence Director, Leach Cluster.

said. "They've had the luxury of being outdoors since February 1, so that puts us further behind the eight-ball."

One of those weaknesses, according to Sortino, was, through no fault of their own, the play of the outfield.

What makes it so frustrating, Sortino said, is the fact that the outfield hasn't even had the chance to practice the routine things that most other nationally ranked teams have been doing for months.

Skills other teams take for granted, like seeing the ball come off the bat, diving for line drives, and working on relay throws, are all skills the UMass squad have only been able to work on for a total of one day.

Other than the weather-tainted weaknesses, Sortino said she sees hers as a solid club from top to bottom.

"Our biggest strength is our depth — we've got a wide range of versatility," Sortino said. "We've got good tenacity on defense and all three of our pitchers throw equally well."

The pitching staff is led by sophomore Kelly Daut, who is 1-5 with a 4.42 earned run average in six games, and senior co-captain Darlene Claffey (1-4, 5.12 in five games). Freshman Dana Colla has yet to record a decision for Sortino, but has appeared in two games.

Senior catcher Sherri Kuchinskas (.300 batting average, two runs batted in and two doubles) leads the Minutewomen offensively.

Freshman shortstop Amy Powell (.240 avg., one RBI, two stolen bases), junior first baseman Rachel Lawson (.222 avg., five RBIs, and two doubles) and senior outfielder Stacey Nichols (.219 avg., three RBIs, and one home run) have also had productive springs so far for the Minutewomen, who are looking forward to getting outside.

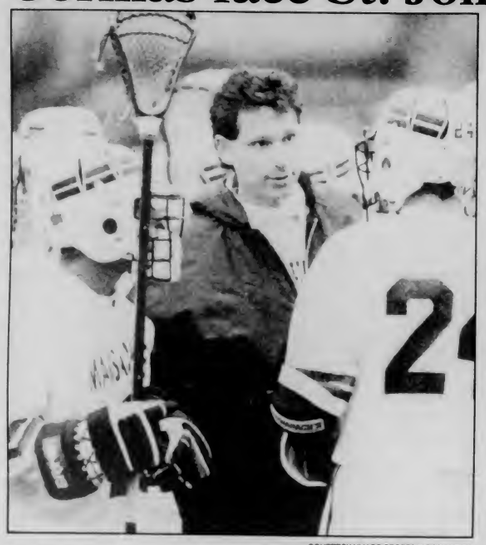
Gorillas face St. John's Redmen in N.Y.



COURTESY UMASS SPORTS INFORMATION
The Gorillas take a post-spring break trip to Jamaica — Jamaica, New York, that is — to face the St. John's Redmen.

By GREG SUKIENNIK
Collegian Staff

Last weekend, the University of Massachusetts men's lacrosse team opened a lot of eyes by coming within two goals of beating Virginia. Now comes the next challenge for the 0-1, 13th-ranked Gorillas: keep the same intensity that nearly knocked off Virginia against St. John's University.

UMass will face SJU tomorrow at 2 p.m. at Redmen Field in Jamaica, N.Y. While SJU isn't as good as Virginia, the Johnnies have proven a difficult opponent, as last year's 11-8 come-from-behind UMass win attests to.

UMass coach Ted Garber is expecting more of the same from St. John's this year.

"We're their biggest game of the year," Garber said. "They've got some junior college transfers and some quality players."

Leading the way for SJU, now 2-2, are returning attackers George Wichelns and Joe York, who account for half of the Redmen's total scoring output. Wichelns, who scored six of St. John's seven goals in a 16-7 loss at rapidly improving Georgetown, has 12 scores and six assists. York has eight scores and nine assists.

Scoring balance, however, is a problem for SJU. After Wichelns and York, the next-highest scorer has a mere six points. This suggests UMass should have a depth advantage over the Redmen.

"I don't think St. John's has the kind of depth Virginia had," Garber said. "But they've got some good players, and they could try and hold the ball all game long.

"We've gotta win the face-offs and make our shots count," Garber said.

The Redmen don't exactly have a killer schedule. They recently humiliated Marist College 20-1, and were scheduled to play New England lax non-entity Holy Cross before weather postponed that match. However, SJU has proven they can give ranked teams fits. Two weeks ago they led at Yale before losing 9-6. Last season, they had a two-goal lead over UMass after three quarters and an 8-7 advantage partway through the fourth before the Gorillas prevailed.

"I'd like to see us control the game early and not let them hang around," Garber said, alluding to last year's sloppy win. "I want to see us play with emotion and desire."

The Gorillas showed a lot of potential in last Saturday's effort at Virginia. But Garber would like to see some improvements in UMass' game, particularly improved clearing and eliminating mistakes.

"We have to be more aware of rebounds in front of the goal," Garber said. "We have to take away giving up garbage goals. You can't play giveaway lacrosse and expect to win at this level."

Rip Correnti will start in goal for the Gorillas with Tom LoPresti backing him up. Garber said he is committed to Correnti as starting goalie for the present. He also hasn't ruled out inserting LoPresti, who started 12 games last season while Correnti was injured, if the situation warrants.

For SJU, Chris Tosti, who stopped 19 UMass shots in a losing cause last year, will most likely start.

Game Notes: Mark Millon has moved into fifth place all-time for UMass goals scored with 100...Saturday's game will not be broadcast on WMUA... If attacker Wes Depp is unavailable, senior Andy Fish is a likely replacement in the starting lineup.

Minutewomen hope to take the field soon

By SEAN P. HAYDEN
Collegian Staff

Frustration. That's been the theme of this spring season for most University of Massachusetts students awaiting the warm weather and the chance to go outside and frolic in the green grass.

However, maybe no one feels this frustration more than softball head coach Elaine Sortino and her Minutewomen squad.

Sortino and the Minutewomen have been sent indoors to practice at Totman Gymnasium thanks to the well-publicized activities of Mother Nature.

The first time the UMass softball team got to actually play outdoors was last week, when the Minutewomen went on a West Coast trip. They returned 2-9, which isn't that bad considering they had to play the No. 3 (University of Nevada-Las Vegas) and No. 7 (University of California-Northridge) teams in the nation, twice each.

"Everything wrong with us came out under a magnifying glass against these teams," Sortino

Men's track ready for spring

By MATT VAUTOUR
Collegian Staff

Welcome to spring. It really is spring, (despite what you've seen lately) and with spring comes track and field action at Llewelyn Derby Track.

Coming off three wins in the final four indoor meets, head coach Ken O'Brien is hoping the men's track and field team will pick up outside where the indoor team left off.

The snow has inhibited practice so far, confining the team to the gyms, the roads and the stadium steps. The focus has been on conditioning.

"The clock has been set back a bit," said O'Brien in reference to the snow. "The coaches and kids are starting to get itchy."

With the opening meet just over a week away, the team will begin to fine tune its events as soon as possible.

The 1993 men's track team is a young squad which will rely on depth and the strength of their underclassmen to be successful. The team graduated seven "blue chip" scorers located in each of the event groups. Coach O'Brien will look to underclassmen to carry the load not only in points, but in leadership as well.

Jim Avery played a lead role for the indoor team, where middle distance is stressed. Avery will be a leader in the 400 and 800 meters, as well as the 400 meter hurdles.

With the graduation of Kevin Walters, junior Lionel Benjamin will step into the spotlight as UMass' top sprinter. Coach O'Brien will rely on him to provide points in the 100 and 200.

After long-jumping in excess of 23 feet during the indoor season, John Johnson will be a force in the jumping events for UMass. The one-two punch of Pat Reed and Craig Cormier will be counted on to lead the distance corps during the 1993 campaign.

The fact that the team is so young has its good and bad points. The inexperience may show through in the early going, but the inexperience is counter-balanced by the promise of a bright future.

O'Brien said he has been particularly impressed with sophomore jumper Tom Galligani (third-highest scorer during indoor) and freshman Mark LeFebvre, who has been impressive in the weight events.

"We spend a lot of time developing the younger players. That's the path we have to take," O'Brien said in reference to the youth movement. "Progress has been good so far. I have no doubt that next year's progress will be faster."

"If we have a key contributor go down, we don't have someone that can step right in and perform just as well," he said.

The men's track team opens its season Saturday, April 3 with a home meet against Vermont and Maine. UMass edged Vermont in a close meet during the indoor season and O'Brien said he expects some tough competition.

"The opener will always be tough," O'Brien said.

After the upcoming home meets, UMass will compete in the Holy Cross Classic and Dartmouth Invitational in the final two weekends of April.

Coach O'Brien invites all students to come down and "take in some pretty good action at the home meets."

Baseball takes to the road to face St. Joseph's

By ARTHUR STAPLETON
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts baseball team will look to weather the recent snowstorms that have hit the East Coast as it travels to St. Joseph's University this weekend for its first Atlantic 10 game of the year.

UMass (4-4) has been unable to play anywhere but Florida so far this season, with both of its other games, including its home opener against Providence College, postponed because of poor playing conditions.

St. Joe's (3-5) got away from the Northeast as well to start the season by traveling to Orlando, Fla. Head coach Chris Loschiavo's team did not immediately find the success that the Minutemen found in the Sunshine State, dropping the first three contests of the regular season.

Despite the rough start, the Hawks rebounded, winning three of their next five, including victories over Bethune-Cookman, 11-0, Cortland State, 15-7, and Southeast Missouri State, 14-8.

St. Joe's, like UMass, found its hitting stroke early and often, scoring 7.4 runs per game on the Florida trip. The Hawk offense was led by freshman leftfielder Danny Lauer, who batted .400 with 10 hits, four runs batted in and five stolen bases.

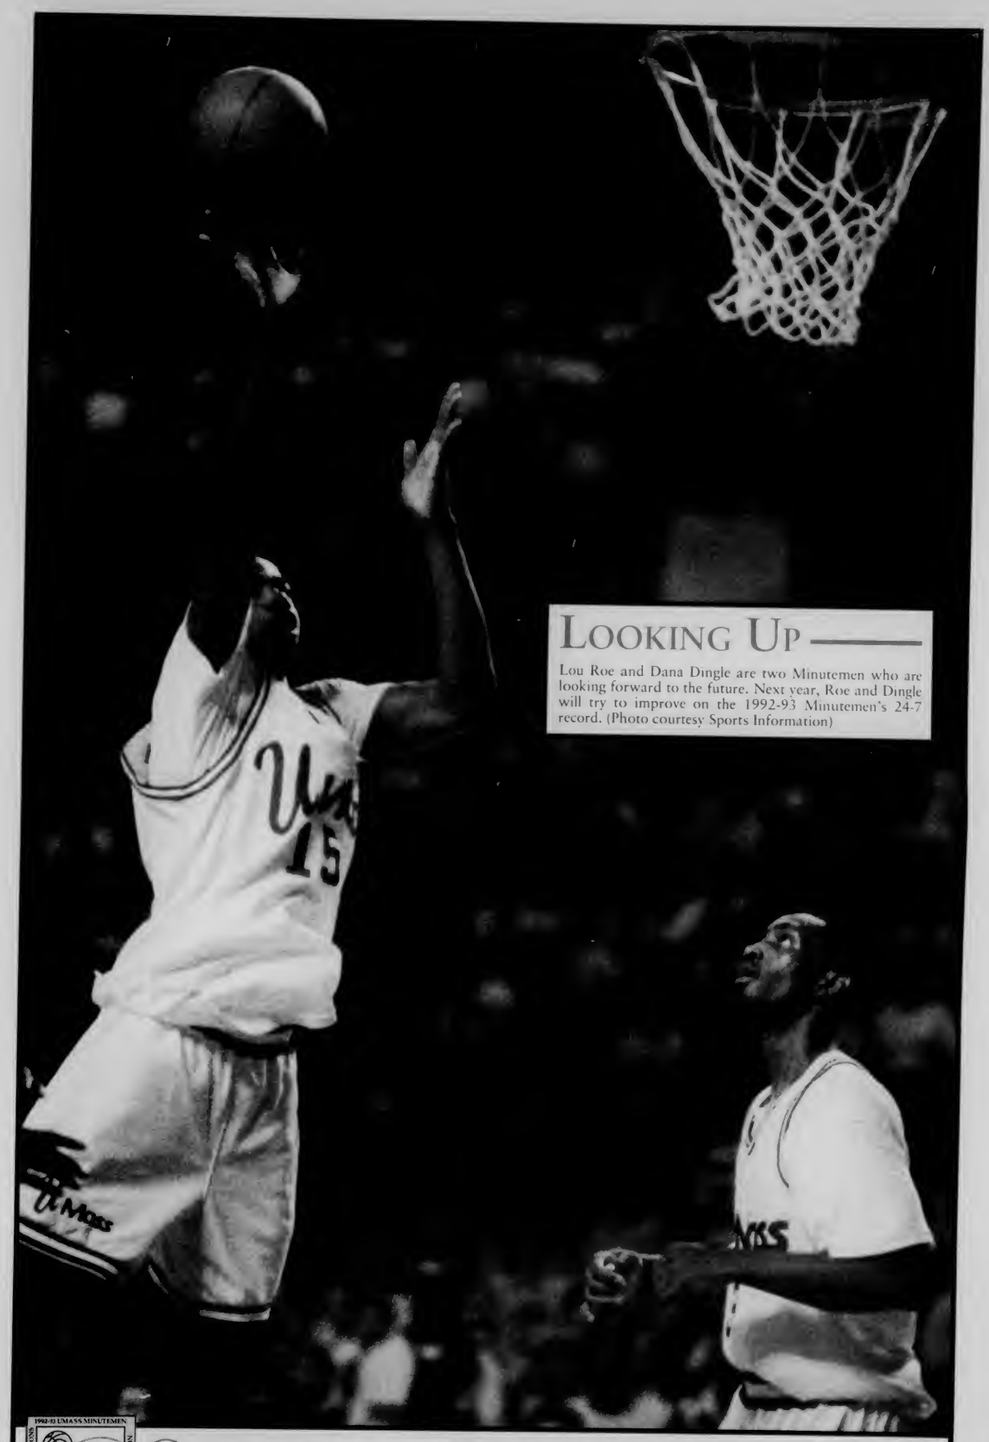
Sophomore utilityman Bill Weingartner hit .333 on the trip while pitching, playing third and first base. Senior rightfielder Ron Obermeier hit .321 with 11 RBI's.

On the mound for the Hawks, sophomore hurler Mike Duffin allowed two hits while striking out nine in the shutout win over Bethune-Cookman. Senior Joe Profera came out of the bullpen on the trip, tossing nine scoreless innings over two games before giving up three earned runs in his last appearance.

Last season, the Minutemen swept the Hawks in back-to-back double dips in which UMass was led by dominant pitching, holding St. Joe's to just two runs and seven hits in the two days.

However, this season the Minutemen are without two pitchers that got them wins against the Hawks, lefty ace Ron Villone and Rich Graham, who were both drafted by the Seattle Mariners. UMass will have to rely on the tandem of Jeff Toothaker (2-1) and Jim Telgheder (1-1). After them, a committee of pitchers will try to hold the Hawk offense off the bases, giving the offense a chance to win the games.

JOSH REYNOLDS / COLLEGIAN
UMass will face St. Joseph's this weekend without first baseman Jay Dodig, who is gone due to graduation.



LOOKING UP

Lou Roe and Dana Dingle are two Minutemen who are looking forward to the future. Next year, Roe and Dingle will try to improve on the 1992-93 Minutemen's 24-7 record. (Photo courtesy Sports Information)

Women expand struggle

Powerful women are seen as a threat, speaker says

By STACY MALONE
Collegian Staff

Women must fight to expand their struggle for basic human rights and break the perception that they are only a "special interest," said the president of the National Organization for Women yesterday in the Student Union Ballroom.

JESSICA TAVERNA / COLLEGIAN
National Organization for Women President Patricia Ireland speaks at the Student Union Ballroom on Sunday.

Patricia Ireland has brought her message to keep fighting for women's rights to Massachusetts in a tour across the state that began March 13, 1993. Her speech to an audience of over 100 people was sponsored by the Everywoman's Center and the Massachusetts NOW.

"What we really won in 1992 were opportunities and not guarantees," Ireland said. "Women are 52 percent of the population and all I need is 50 seats in the Senate for women. I only want half the power in Congress."

Ireland said she is excited that the number of women in the Senate has tripled, that 100 percent of the women in Congress are pro-choice, one-fourth of the women in Congress are women of color and that they know experiences such as wage gaps, child care and sex discrimination.

"There are clear differences that women make," Ireland said. "We bring a different set of priorities to public policy because of our different experiences."

Ireland said she believes it is great that the Clinton administration has so much diversity and that it will make a difference in the results of his administration. She said in pushing for a woman as attorney general many important issues came into public consciousness.

"Part of the reason Zoë Baird was not portrayed as a sympathetic character by the media was because she has money and was characterized as being a rich bitch," Ireland said. "If that was 'Joey Baird' it would have been different."

Ireland said Kimba Wood was punished for not using her women's intuition in anticipating the passing of the immigration law and the "only alternative was to find a childless woman with a dirty house."

"We are forcing women to make tough choices between

Board rejects liquor license for Twisters

By MARK PRESTON
Collegian Staff

The sale of Twisters Tavern hit another snag Thursday night as the Amherst Zoning Board rejected the transfer of Twisters' liquor license from ELO East to the Apache River Corporation.

ELO East, the corporation which owns Twisters, is in bankruptcy court with a hearing in late April concerning the fate of Twisters.

Amherst resident Edward Sunderland, one of the two voters on the three-member zoning board who opposed the transfer said, "A large number of people will be coming to an area which needs peace and tranquility."

Sunderland was referring to the frequent complaints made by the elderly residents of the Clark House Apartments, about the constant noise and lewdness they allege occur at closing time from patrons of the bar.

Chairperson Alice Epstein was the other board member who voted against the transfer.

Paul Lawler, who was the only board member voting for the transfer said, "Give them an opportunity and a chance — it is the only fair thing to do."

Richard Howland, the Apache River Corporation's attorney said, "[The Zoning Board and the Select Board] have risked giving the control of the sale and the decision-making about the licensing to the bankruptcy judge."

"They risked all control of getting a better man-

Conference writers discuss racism in the media

By ALYSSA M. OWENS
Collegian Staff

The ability of Whites to write about Blacks and the level of racism in the United States was the topic of a heated discussion during the final day of "The Art of Nonfiction" writers' conference held last Thursday and Friday.

"Most often when you come across a Black person in a public forum, they're talking about race," said Brent Staples, the moderator of the discussion, titled "White on Black."

"Black people are trapped in the body of the culture," Staples said. "News is by, for and about White people."

Staples is an essayist and member of the New York Times Editorial Board and the author of a memoir, "Parallel Time."

The discussion also included Henry "Buzzy" Bissinger, author of Friday Night Lights, about football and racism in Odessa, Texas; Patrice Gaines, a Washington Post and National Public Radio writer; Walt Harrington, author of Crossings: A White Man's Journey into Black America; and Nick Lemann, author of "The Promised Land: The Great Black Migration and How It Changed America."

Harrington said he believes the racist attitude of Whites is only one form of prejudice the nation faces. Others include reverse pressure experienced by Whites in dealing with Blacks and economic classes within the Black community, he said.

"My job is to make that world come to life for folks who don't understand," Harrington said.

Most of the writers said they agreed that it is possible for Whites to write effectively about Blacks.

"I dispel the notion of 'Only write about what you know,'" Lemann said. "If you take the time to learn the subject, you can write about anything."

Gaines agreed, saying, "People shouldn't say, 'You're not from here, so you can't write about this.'"

Bissinger discussed his thoughts on writing about a Black high school football player in Odessa, Texas.

"I approached him as being subject to one of the most horrible forms of racism I'd ever seen," Bissinger said. "One of the things I'm most proud of in my life is exposing the horrible racism that exists in the culture that we call sports. It's really [expletive] up."

Chancellorship finalist will speak to students

By TRACY MONAHAN
Collegian Staff

Claudia Mitchell-Kernan, one of three candidates for the University of Massachusetts chancellorship, will address the campus in a number of forums today.

Mitchell-Kernan, who has been the dean and vice-chancellor of graduate studies at the University of California at Los Angeles since 1989, will speak on multiculturalism at 9:15 a.m. in Campus Center 168 and will address an open forum for students in the Cape Cod Lounge at 3:30 p.m.

Mitchell-Kernan received her Ph.D. in anthropology from University of California at Berkeley in 1969. After teaching at Harvard for four years, she joined the department of anthropology at UCLA, where she holds a joint appointment in psychiatry.

In 1976, she became director of the UCLA Center for Afro-American Studies. She has published several books on childhood socialization and African-American community, and has lectured extensively on sex ratios, patterns of race and cultural dynamics.

Mitchell-Kernan currently holds a position on the Chancellor's Council for Diversity at UCLA. She has been active on other committees, including the search committee for a director of the women's studies program, the search committee for an urban anthropologist and the provost's advisory group on Black faculty recruitment.

She has taught comparative urbanization, Afro-American anthropology, urban anthropology and various other subjects. Mitchell-Kernan has travelled to Curacao, Guadeloupe, Somalia, Trinidad and other countries to pursue her research studies.

UMass Budget Director Joyce Hatch, a member of the chancellor's search committee, said Mitchell-Kernan was chosen for her experience and her reputation as a good manager at UCLA.

Jo-Anne Vanin, dean of students and vice-chancellor for student affairs, said Mitchell-Kernan has an outstanding record of achievement at UCLA.

"I personally am delighted to find a woman candidate, a woman of color, with Bissinger recounted a story of asking one of the player's coaches where the player would be without football. Bissinger said the coach replied "he'd be a dumb ol' nigger."

"If you have enough sympathy and empathy you can write about anything and everything," Bissinger said.

Staples noted that the panelists had an "edge in their voices" while discussing the topic and asked them to "pin down this emotion."

"I'm getting a sense that you don't think Whites can't write about Blacks," Bissinger said. "If you care and are compassionate and have a sense of outrage, you will get the message across."

"You're making me feel defensive and it's pissing me off," Bissinger said to Staples.

The panelists presented disparate views as they discussed the level of racism in today's newsrooms.

"I used to have a Black news beat," Gaines said. "I thought I could find stories that I knew."

Gaines said, instead, she found Blacks thought of her as an enemy because she worked for a "white publication."

"I think newsrooms are becoming caldrons of racism," Bissinger said. "It's becoming the next South Africa. I think race relations in this country are awful."

Lemann said, "I have a much less apocalyptic view of racism than [Bissinger] has. As a fifth generation Louisianan, I've seen a lot of improvements. In fact, I never thought it could be so good."

"I don't think most White people in America think they're racist," Lemann said. "You have to be really effective as a writer to show them they are more prejudiced than they think they are."

Housing Committee holds student forum

"It's a chance for everyone in the community to express their concerns and their perspective," said Mary Ellen Sailer, chairperson for the Housing Services Review Committee about the open forum to be held at the Hampshire Dining Commons from 7 p.m. to 9 p.m.

"We're directed toward assessing how housing is performing now and reporting to the Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs, Thomas Robinson. He makes the decision if their procedures will change, but what the committee does is estimate if housing is supporting the mission of the university," she said.

She said the committee's goals are customer service oriented, and for those who can't attend the forum tonight, there will be two others, one on Tuesday, March 30 at the Worcester Dining Commons from 7 p.m. to 9 p.m. and one on Thursday, April 1 at the Campus Center Room 165 from 1 p.m. to 3 p.m.

Women protest violence during rush-hour traffic

By KRISTEN LANS
Collegian Staff

Women positioned themselves on street corners in Amherst during Friday mornings' rush-hour in an educational protest to end violence against women sparked by the murder of Tara Hartnett.

Twenty-six women distributed approximately 700 fliers an hour to drivers stopped at the lights at the intersection of Main and North Pleasant streets.

The message the women were attempting to put across was broadcast from signs attached to shirt fronts and fliers — Tara Hartnett is not alone.

Hartnett was a University of Massachusetts senior murdered a week ago in her Sunderland apartment. James Cyr, her former boyfriend, has been arrested and charged with the murder.

Present at the protest were members of the organizing body Women's Action Coalition (WAC), as well as members of Necessities/Necesidades, the Men's Resource Connection, University students and children.

Meg Kroeplin, a member of WAC, outlined the reason for the educational protest.

"Often people are too busy going through their daily business that they aren't home to read the newspaper or watch the news and things like this go unnoticed," Kroeplin said.

Kroeplin said she believes Friday's protest is one step in breaking the silence of battered women.

"I hope people become really outraged so that they take responsibility," Kroeplin said. "I want them to lobby legislators, to teach girls to have self-esteem and to teach people to be less violent."

Alice MacIntyre, a former area resident and activist, was present Friday and said she has been protesting women's murders for 15 years, but that she believes the situation has only gotten worse during that time.

Protestors handed out fliers which stated that a woman is murdered by a man she knows well every eight days in Massachusetts. This statistic represents a 150 percent increase since 1989.

MacIntyre criticized the educational demonstration, calling it a "typical liberal response" to the problem of violence against women.

"For me, violence against women is a problem of power — who has it and who doesn't," MacIntyre said. "We can educate every man and woman in the country and things will not change."

A woman who gave her name as Wende X., who left her batterer 14 years ago, said she agreed that demonstrations like Friday's have little effect on the rate of violence against women, although X. said she had a personal reason for being present.

"This helps me deal with my anger," Wende X. said. "I am trying to dissipate my anger so that I do not turn violent."

Wende X. said her situation 14 years ago was very similar to Hartnett's. She said she left her batterer when her baby was eleven months old.

"The only thing that saved me was that I lived in a complex and not in an isolated situation like Tara did," Wende X. said.

Two of her children, 6 and 7-years-old, handed out fliers to stopped cars alongside their mother. Signs on their shirts read: "Stop killing our mothers" and "Another kid against violence."

Sue Klopman, a member of WAC and formerly a battered woman, stressed the importance of education. She said it is one of her key issues because many people believe that battering is a woman's fault.

"There are two myths working against women," Klopman said. "In the home she is never good enough and in society she never stands up for herself."

Klopman and MacIntyre spoke about their views on male involvement in the fight against violence against women.

MacIntyre was critical of the Fridays' organizers and said, "Men do not have any place at a demonstration like this because it makes us look like we are all on the same side of the issue."

Klopman said, "There are times when I am ambivalent about men's involvement and there are times when it is crucial for women to stand by ourselves."

"Women never have an opportunity to stand alone in this society because we are never good enough, if we are not standing with a man," Klopman said.

Christian right examined

The advocation of the anti-gay agenda

By ANDREW LUMB
Collegian Staff

The gay community has a great deal of work to catch up with the Christian Right's political influence and financial support, according to a political analyst and a magazine editor who spoke Thursday night.

The lecture, titled "The Christian Right and their anti-gay agenda," included Chip Berlet, an analyst with Political Research Associates, and Anne d'Adesky, an editor of OUT magazine. The lecture was organized by the Program for GLB Concerns and held in the Campus Center.

The Christian Right is reactionary, Berlet explained, and wants values to go back to a time when everyone had "clearly defined roles." Berlet said this is different from being conservative, which means trying to slow down change.

Berlet said the Christian Right is fundamentalist, declaring the Bible to be the word of God and should be taken literally, and evangelical in that "they reach out and bring people in."

Fearing that their social values are in jeopardy, they have "backlashed," stopping any debate on change, or if forced into it, talking about civil rights issues as a "package," Berlet said.

The Christian Right "failed to notice," according to Berlet, that to escape religious oppression was why people came to this country, and was incorporated into the Constitution as separation of church and state.

They believe in the Biblically-based dominion theology, which says that God gave the dominion of Earth to man, causing a confrontation with secular society, Berlet said.

"It is not going to be an easy group to overcome," said Berlet, referring to their political muscle, which includes marketing surveys, computers, good organization and a televangelism industry that brings in $2 billion dollars a year.

The Christian Right sees President Bill Clinton as the Anti-Christ, Berlet said. They caused a split in the Republican party when former President Reagan didn't deliver on his promises to them, and were a factor in the choosing of former Vice-President Quayle and Chief of Staff John Sununu.

D'Adesky, a member of the New York-based activist group Lesbian Avengers, provided an inside view of the gay community's opposition.

She said the biggest problem was giving this "social justice movement" a face, in an attempt to minimize "internalized homophobia," which has arisen because gays are not comfortable with religion, schools and family.

The gay movement has been associated with pedophilia, bestiality, necrophilia and AIDS by the Christian Right to portray them as "the other," and is not sure how to respond.

An attempt by gay organizations to cover their weaknesses by finding "natural allies," such as other civil rights groups and progressive clergy, has introduced the problem of identity because they are worried about "selling out."

D'Adesky said gay activists in Colorado and Oregon pushed for legislation to end discrimination by sexual preference. They lost Colorado by 6 percent.

The judge decided "no jurisdictions will make laws [pertaining to gay and lesbian concerns]," because he deemed them to be "special rights."

In Oregon, legislation against discrimination was passed, and the gay activists attribute the success to having more money and concentrating on urban areas.

Audience questions focused on techniques used to influence how the public views an organization.

Asked why he did not make a distinction between U.S. and international fundamentalism, Berlet responded "the world won't make a distinction."

However, he mentioned that newspapers must be careful how they portray groups, using the example that "Muslims blow up World Trade Center" as a headline would generate much less criticism than "Christians shoot abortion doctor."

In response to another question about how gay activists could generate a favorable image, d'Adesky mentioned that the Christian Right had reporters asking such biased questions about gay teachers as "what do you think about a homosexual man working with your children?"

Women discuss work in technical fields

By BRIAN GORMLEY
Collegian Staff

Three professional women spoke to graduate students about about what it takes for women to succeed in "male-dominated" technical fields Thursday night.

The panel discussion, titled "Women in Technical Careers: Confidence and Leadership," included Margret Rakas, Lee Tatistcheff and Leslie Jelalian. Nancy Hellman, undergraduate dean of engineering and director of the women's engineering program, moderated the discussion.

Rakas is the senior polymer engineer for Loctite, a fortune 500 company that makes adhesives and coatings. She said in order to succeed, women must take every opportunity to learn more about their given fields.

"Unfortunately, people will judge by appearance," she said. "If you appear hazy during important meetings people will get the wrong impression about you.

"Stay current in your field, take initiative and show that you are interested," Rakas said. "Look for opportunities to grow. You may have take work home with you, work on weekends, or work later than five o'clock."

Rakas said putting in extra effort is the difference between a good worker and an average one.

"I work 45 to 50 hours a week, and that's my choice," she said. "I would do fine if I only worked from eight to four. To be successful you have to work 10 to 15 percent harder than the average person."

Tratistcheff is the Principal Lab Analysis Engineer for Digital Equipment Corporation. She talked about how difficult it is to be the only woman in a meeting of executives.

"As you get higher and higher up (in the business world) you see more and more males," she said. "Some woman leaders will even bring a friend along to a meeting of all men just so there will be another woman there."

Jelalian, who graduated from the University of Massachusetts in 1988 with an engineering degree, is currently the project lead engineer for CNIA Antennas. She said she has been able to use the fact that she is a minority to her advantage.

"I have benefited from being a woman because many people want to see me succeed," she said.

Jelalian said being a minority in the technical field has helped her because it has increased her visibility. She also said it is her responsibility to be understanding of men, who are not used to working with women.

"You have to accept that you are a minority," she said. "But part of your job as a minority is to make men more comfortable, and in that way you are making it easier for the other women around you."

agement team," Howland said.

He said, "Our proposal to the board, the Apache River Corporation and all the parties involved was win, win, win."

A handful of residents from Clark House attended the public hearing Thursday night.

Amherst resident Arnold Silver, an opponent of the transfer said, "I have friends who live in Clark House who have cried on my shoulders because they are unable to get a good night's sleep."

Elizabeth Massey, manager of Clark House said, "Having a college bar next to an apartment complex just hasn't worked."

A line was forming outside Twisters while its fate was being decided only 50 yards away at Bangs Community Center where the meeting was held. Amherst Selectman Dave Keenan said he was puzzled by the lack of student turnout to support Twisters.

"Isn't the possible closing of a college bar a student issue?" Keenan asked.

Howland asked members of the board to evaluate any prejudices they might have about Twisters past.

He said, "I ask you to consult your conscience, we want to be heard without the trappings of the past issues."

He said, "It would be unfair for you to judge the permit application based upon the past history of Twisters."

Epstein said, "Twisters has been before the board three times while I have been a member and I feel I am capable of making an impartial decision."

Howland said he questioned Epstein's impartiality upon arriving at her decision.

The proposed new owners want to expand the bar's capacity from 120 to 199 patrons at any given time. The increase would have the downstairs and the terrace considered as one entity. However, no more than 52 people would be allowed on the terrace at any given time.

Howland said he used the state plumbing code to arrive at the figure of 199 occupants. Employees and musicians would be counted in this figure.

The corporation is also seeking to have five musicians provide entertainment in the downstairs bar at night. This would be an increase from the three that are now allowed.

In addition to the live entertainment downstairs, the corporation has also asked to have three acoustic string instruments be allowed to play on the terrace until 9 p.m.

Howland said, "Entertainment is a vital part of the make-up of Twisters Tavern."

Silver said, "I don't think they are enhancing the situation by increasing musicians and patrons."

Extra security outside at closing time, the use of the entrance adjacent to Pinocchio's Restaurant and having last call at 12:30 a.m. were all part of the management plan presented by the corporation to the board and its audience. This security would help to deter noise and usher people away from the area at closing time.

The Apache River Corporation would be providing the best security of any bar in Amherst, Howland said.

"I have doubts if anybody can control the outside of a bar at closing time," Epstein said.

"I don't think their honesty and intentions are in doubt, but I still have a problem with what is being asked," Sunderland said.

The Apache River Corporation is made up of two former Steigers executives, John Oakland of Wilbraham and William K. Miller of Holyoke.

Miller said he had no comment until he could further assess the situation.

Asian heritage exploited

Last Friday, over 700 people gathered in the Campus Center to devour, vulgarize and prostitute the rich traditions and heritage of Asia. The American descendants of half the world's population have taken it upon themselves to affirm and legitimize the notion of the "noble savage" — dancing, singing and twirling in their brightly colored garbs while swaying to traditional songs.

Rather than a celebration of Asian culture, Asian Night is an extravagant, self-indulgent, exploitative display of orientalism by the immigrant community in the United States. This community, under the auspices of multiculturalism, romanticizes and exoticises Asian people and culture, only reinforcing stereotypes of a Eurocentric American audience.

Shyamala
IVATURY

The majority of the Asian community in America does not oppose U.S. foreign policy and its impact on Asian peoples: the death of 400,000 Iraqi citizens during the Gulf War, the uprooting of three million Palestinians from their homeland, the death of two million Koreans during the Korean War, the death of one million Cambodians and two million Vietnamese during the war in Southeast Asia. North Korea, India, Pakistan, Iran and Iraq are denied the right to legitimate self-defense even though it is the U.S. that has the largest arsenal of nuclear weapons and the unique distinction of dropping nuclear bombs in two cities in Japan, and threatening to drop bombs on countless other countries. The U.S. has stationed over 40,000 troops in South Korea, another 40,000 on the Okinawa Naval Base in Japan, and has a base on Deigo Garica, jeopardizing the security of all Asian nations.

Furthermore, nuclear testing on the islands of Micronesia has resulted in mutilated babies and children. It is the U.S. that commits the grossest human rights violations within its own boundaries against African-Americans and other people of color, yet has the gall to criticize China.

Filipino women were brought to entertain U.S. soldiers in Iraq, the sex trade and prostitution in Thailand caters to Western businessmen, poor Asian women are used as wombs for American women who don't want to go through the rigors of childbirth, and the organs of poor Asian people are traded to sustain American receptors through organ transplants. The economies of countries like India remain in shambles due to unfair trading rules imposed on them by the U.S. through its proxies, the International Monetary Fund and World Bank.

Culture includes the way of life of the people in the various parts of the world. The extraction of cultural symbolism with disregard and even contempt for the lives of people in the countries reveals the extent to which Asian Americans have sold themselves for money and are bereft of any sense of collective self-respect, dignity and humanity.

Clinging to vacuous symbolism while denying their complicity with a system that exploits people on the Asian continent will not bring Asian Americans any closer to their roots, nor can it restore their sense of pride. While economic embargoes and wars against countries in Asia ravage the continent, it is a shame that the only time Asian American students come together is to dance, sing and eat. While basking in the glory of multiculturalism, one should not forget that Asian Night is not about Asia. Asia, the cradle of civilization, symbolizes the history of humanity's struggle against exploitation, colonialism and barbarism.

It's time for Oscar angst

The Oscars. Why does one care? You either like a film or you don't; what's in envelope six months later alters nothing. Hellraiser III could win best original screenplay, but it still wouldn't mean it was true.

Yet you feel an almost personal affront when the "wrong" films win. When nominations were revealed this year I felt ridiculously outraged, as if the nominating committee were deliberately trying to dupe the public. Of the five nominees for best picture, four didn't deserve the honor.

Jesse
ARMSTRONG

Perhaps this is the problem with the Oscars: it brings out that dogmatic side in people. You can't help but universalize your subjective opinion until it is The Truth, and I am no exception; I know that The Crying Game has been massively overrated, that Howards End is mediocre, Scent of a Woman is sentimental claptrap and A Few Good Men is Hollywood pap. I'm convinced that in the Big Book of Objective Truths under "Best films of 1992" will be recorded Malcolm X, Husbands and Wives, The Player and Unforgiven. And this is what it might say about the other nominations:

Howards End: Perhaps the best thing about this picture is that finally all of E.M. Forster's books have been transferred to the big screen. All we have to fear now is that in a sudden fit of creative panic Merchant-Ivory will attempt to film Aspects of the Novel.

It was difficult to watch Howards End without a feeling of "so what?" We already know director James Ivory can do a faultless recreation of Edwardian England, but one can only sit through so many Helena Bonham-Carter pouts in one lifetime, and excellent performances by Anthony Hopkins and Emma Thompson do not make up for the dreadful unsubtlety of the portrayal of the Basts.

Scent of a Woman might be more appropriately titled Scent of a Camembert, so cheesy and predictable is the playing of the audience's emotions. Likewise, while A Few Good Men is entertaining in a run-of-the-mill kind of way it can only have received a nomination for A Few Good Scenes, most notably when Jack Nicholson appears to embarrass the rest of the cast with the force of his performance.

It may be that my dislike of The Crying Game has been exaggerated in reaction to the critical praise heaped onto it, but it seems that what was an interesting enough, though severely faulted, movie has been credited with depths and subtleties it doesn't posses.

Stephen Rea, the emotionally and politically buffeted Fergus, was the only performer who came close to carrying the implausible weight of the film. Forest Whitaker was left wrestling with an ungainly English accent in the desperately stagey first part of the film, and then like a bad dream reappeared farcically thundering toward the audience in after-death cricket whites looking ridiculous enough to induce choked squeals of laughter from the audience I was in. Perhaps the most charitable thing you can say about Jaye Davidson, as Dil, is that he made an excellent woman, but when called upon to act he clung desperately to the same all-purpose "look of bewilderment."

I want to be vindicated tonight when they rip open the envelopes, and so does everyone else; that is why there will be plenty of debate even after the stars have retreated to Beverly Hills to lick their wounds or massage their egos.

GLB speakers impress a skeptic

The GLB movement has always been confusing to me. I attribute that to the fact that I have ideological differences with those in the movement. Whether I have been socialized to believe homosexual activity is wrong isn't the question; I have most definitely been socialized to believe that. The question is whether I accept it as legitimate and deserving of basic rights. Does every man and woman have the same basic rights regardless of sexual preference? Are the things the gay community demands as rights really just privileges they are upset about not being entitled to?

I attended a GLB Speakers Bureau at McNamara Hall March 25. I decided it was my responsibility to hear an opposing point of view to honestly have my own. I had to hear reasons, arguments and the perspective of the "opposition." I felt ignorant harboring stereotypes without verifying them. It turned out to be an interesting and enlightening experience. I found the speakers from the gay community more calm and professional than the people debating for them out of moral outrage. The discussion was honest, open and broad. It offered the opportunity to address false stereotypes and debate contemporary issues of gay rights. Don't misunderstand me: I still harbor ideological differences. However, only the ignorant and narrow-minded refuse to hear the "opposing point of view." Those who disagree have every right to, as I feel is my right, but I do not respect those who do so with contempt sown with ignorance.

Has my point of view changed? No, but my perspective has and so has my respect for some of those who I would only generalize about in days past. The GLB Speakers Bureau is a very informational event. I encourage any and all to attend.

I wrote this in the hopes of expressing myself and broadening my opinions, as well as those of some of you. For as liberal-minded as the student body claims to be, many show utter contempt for those who don't roll over and wave the "flag of the oppressed" alongside them. We are all entitled to opposing views. That is our right, isn't it?

Chancellor's policy of praying for quiet just isn't working

There are those who say the editorial page is just a place for angry egotists, like me, to express their opinion. These people just don't know how to read a paper that is not only news, but acts as the voice of the students. It is amazing how much one can learn about this campus by observing the content of the Collegian.

For instance, what was the major Ed/Op focus last semester? A moment of reflection should bring the words "racism" and "student rights" to the tip of any hypothetical tongue. All tongues except one, that is: our chancellor's.

The Collegian reported in early March that Chancellor O'Brien is "hoping that this will be a relatively quiet spring." Apparently, our chancellor subscribes to the philosophic teachings of Bill Cosby. In Bill Cosby, Himself, the famous UMass alumnus talks about the noise his kids make and then he tells us how he handles it: "Parents don't care about justice; they just want QUIET!"

Perhaps O'Brien should consider the implications of such a comment and choose his words better before he speaks. Does he actually approve of the "Just Say No/Nothing" approach that led to so much ignorance in the Reagan years? I certainly don't want to see any more racism or violence, but I would be ashamed to go to any university that lauded "quiet." That no one has stormed Whitmore or rioted on the Student Union steps lately doesn't mean his job is done. Does he really think the real problems have gone away, that justice has been served or that he can coast through his last semester without taking initiative or responsibility?

Steven
L. COHEN

I challenge Chancellor O'Brien to answer a question my girlfriend posed to me. Riddle me this, Dick, she said: "I came here from Virginia because I had heard how liberal it was here. How and why does such a liberal school have so much racism, anti-Semitism and homophobia?"

So what has been the crusade of the Ed/Op page this semester? Cannabis reform, 'cause it's safer than cigarettes, alcohol and skiing! If you thought the job market didn't like ZooMass, wait till they hear that we want to legalize pot in campus policy despite local, state and federal laws. The Grateful Dead might come to play, but we are going to lose any respect this institution has acquired.

Although I disagree with hemp legalization, I'm not going to preach on that now. I'm more concerned with what has been missing on this issue. The moment the Cannabis Reform Coalition received 2,000 signatures to place their initiative on the SGA ballot, the matter of its illegality should have spawned a position from the administration. What kind of chancellor doesn't respond to a policy situation of this magnitude? A "quiet" one doesn't, of course. Does he think he can make things go away by not acknowledging them? His lack of opposition only implies false support! Doesn't he know what appeasement/non-intervention can lead to?

Richard O'Brien, your policy of "don't worry; have a Coke and a smile" is disappointing. And remember, you read it in the Collegian, 'cause we aren't angry egotists — we just care.

having a career and having children," Ireland said. "We hear how important children are to society, but we will punish women for taking care of them while defining child care as unskilled labor."

"The more women are in non-traditional jobs and the closer they are to having power, the more susceptible they are to sexual harassment," Ireland said.

She said when Geraldine Ferraro was chosen as Walter Mondale's running mate in the 1984 presidential election, her excitement was dampened by people who walked around wearing buttons for "Fritz and Tits."

"A reduction of women to body parts is a way to keep us in our place," Ireland said. "If you want to stand on your own two feet and define yourself rather than defining yourself through a man, then you are not considered a real woman."

Ireland said people must continue to fight sexism, homophobia and racism because such oppression and discrimination is blatantly wrong.

She also said a real problem exists in the military, as many heterosexual men fear the possibility of showering with gay men, even though it obviously occurs now.

"Like gay men aren't there now — apparently they are all being dry-cleaned," Ireland said.

"Straight men are afraid they will be sexually harassed just like they have been doing to women for centuries."

Join the fight against hunger.

Here's your weapon.

Now each time you use the Card, you help buy a meal for a hungry person.

Our goal? To help buy 1,000,000 meals* for America's hungry. And you can take part just by using the American Express Card.

You see, each time you charge a purchase to the Card between March 15 and April 30, 1993, you help pay for one meal. The more purchases you make, no matter how big or small, the more meals you help provide. It's that simple.

To make it all work, we've teamed up with Share Our Strength, a nationwide non-profit organization fighting to end hunger. They're doing it in some very resourceful ways.

For example, most restaurants have extra food at the end of the night, but they don't always know what to do with it. SOS does. They see to it that the food is delivered to those who need it. In fact, they've mobilized more than 5000 restaurants to join the fight against hunger, here in the U.S. and around the world.

So remember, now one of the most valuable reasons to use the Card isn't for what you can get, but for what you give.

If you're not currently a Cardmember, but would like to apply, please call us at 1-800-365-AMEX.

The 65th Annual Academy Awards

By JON LUPO
Collegian Staff

This is the last in a six-part series highlighting the major nominees for the 65th Annual Academy Awards which will be presented on March 29.

The Academy Awards are a singularly perplexing event. Part industry shmooze, fashion show and popularity contest, this king of awards shows continues to intrigue, infuriate, entertain and frustrate us. Tonight, just about the whole world will be watching third-time host Billy Crystal as he steers the 65th Annual Academy Awards, live on ABC.

Despite seldom being a barometer of any given year's "best," the Oscars have retained an aura of "excellence" in an industry whose focus is primarily on the bottom line. Art and commerce often collide in this world, but they never seem to connect.

This year's sexist, racist and snobby nominations confirm the stunning dichotomy that is the Academy Awards. They want to honor the best — so long as its safe, mostly male and almost always White.

The slap-in-the-face kiss-off to Spike Lee and Malcolm X is a key example of this. Lee's outspoken manner has made him a Hollywood outsider, but the Academy's dislike of the man should certainly not extend to his work. Anything more glaring than Malcolm X's two token nods — for actor and costume design — was 1989's jaw-dropping omission of Do the Right Thing among the Best Picture nominations. That year, the Academy voted Driving Miss Daisy Best Picture. As Spike Lee himself pointed out: which view of Blacks was safer to the mostly older, male and conservative Academy voting block? Suddenly, a win for Al Pacino for Best Actor doesn't seem so out of the ordinary.

The Academy has dedicated this year's Oscars to "Women in Film." This is like dedicating Basic Instinct to ACT-UP. In a year that saw achingly few roles for actresses in general, the best thing Hollywood could come up with was Basic Instinct and Sister Act. Bisexual psycho killers and nuns. Hmmm. I won't even count A League of Their Own, which reduced a subject rich with feminist ideals and great female roles to baseball movie cliches, cheap sentiment and crocodile tears.

In fact, the Academy had to reach far and wide to come up with enough nominees to fill the Best Actress categories. It also says more about the state of American cinema for women when out of the ten nominations in both lead and supporting categories, only four are American actresses. Thelma & Louise, where are you when we need you? Better women's roles were found in Alison Anders' Gas Food Lodging and Julie Dash's Daughters of the Dust, but people (at least not the mass public) didn't see them, and neither did the Academy.

In 1993, independents proved a real threat to Hollywood. A slew of non-industry films — specifically The Crying Game, The Player and Howards End — made a statement that quality films are increasingly becoming harder to make within the studios. For every indie triumph like Reservoir Dogs there's a Weekend At Bernie's. For every breakthrough gay role in The Crying Game or The Living End, there's a Basic Instinct to reinforce anachronistic stereotypes. And despite the independents' recent string of superior films, it's easy to see that nothing will change. You can see Weekend at Bernie's 2 this summer at a theater near you.

Unforgiven, Clint Eastwood's fine but hardly revelatory revisionist Western, has the inside track for a sweep tonight. It's a Hollywood movie, has lots of testosterone in it and made a lot of money. Same with the formulatic but entertaining A Few Good Men and the blind guy schmaltz of Scent of A Woman.

The remaining nominees, Howards End and The Crying Game are vastly superior, but they're still considered out of the mainstream. As Peter Travers pointed out, "It's no crime to enjoy films that coddle us, but shouldn't awards go to films that challenge us instead?"

My choice for Best Picture is Neil Jordan's marvelous head trip/political thriller The Crying Game. For once, the hype lived up to expectations — and exceeded them on more than one occasion. Jordan's film was filled with impossible roles that were carried out to perfection by a near-perfect cast.

Stephen Rea, Miranda Richardson, Forest Whitaker and Jaye Davidson created intense performances in a film that explored territory that most movies — specifically Hollywood ones — would run away from. Gender roles, male-female and gay relationships made for a tantalizing movie experience that can only be described as the most original and thought-provoking film of the 1990s.

I wouldn't be upset if James Ivory's sublime art-house triumph Howards End wins the coveted award. These kinds of period costume dramas are almost becoming a genre unto themselves. But Howards End is more than the glossy Hollywood romance of Out of Africa and the silly fluffiness of Enchanted April, it is a deeply moving character drama without the garish sentiment that usually plagues Hollywood films described as "deeply moving."

Other picks: for Best Original Screenplay, I'd go with Neil Jordan's most imaginative script for The Crying Game, with Woody Allen's smart Husbands and Wives a close second. Best Adapted Screeplay honors should go to Ruth Prawer Jhabvala's film version of E.M. Forster's Howards End, now being touted (and rightly so) as the best single novel adaptation in quite a while or Michael Tolkin's blisteringly funny work in The Player.

For Best Cinematography, now reduced to Best Scenery or Best Mountain Range/Sunset, I'll go with Philippe Rousselot's gorgeous Montana vistas in A River Runs Through It with Tony Pierce-Roberts sumptuous work in Howards End a worthy runner-up. And for Best Art Direction, I'm for the backlot gothic of Bram Stoker's Dracula or the mind-bending sets of Toys — bad movies whose biggest strengths were their eye-candy visuals.

There will be justifiable winners, worthy losers and some wrong decisions tonight — that is the only sure thing about the Academy Awards. Despite its shaky political ideology and questionable selection process, the Oscars remain a shining moment of pop culture silliness. Therein lies their innate appeal — the few shining seconds after the nominees are listed and before the winners are proclaimed. After that, it's just trivia.

BELOW IS A PROGRESS REPORT OF MULTICULTURAL ACTIVITIES. Reports, issued from the Chancellor's office, will be written each month. The intent of the reports, and the essays, by different faculty or staff members, is not only to follow agreements reached between the administration and ALANA students, but also to list the efforts of the community at large in working towards a truly multicultural campus.

CAN WE TALK? ABOUT "MULTICULTURAL"? ABOUT "MULTICULTURALISM"?

by Grant Ingle
Director of the Office of Human Relations

In recent years the goal to "achieve a multicultural campus" in our campus mission statement has sparked both controversy and confusion, but far too little serious open, public debate. Many on the campus are genuinely puzzled about what this goal means, who and what it includes and what courses of action it mandates. A few believe they do understand this goal, but their interpretations often conflict. For some, "achieving a multicultural campus" smacks of official efforts to enforce a type of "political correctness" on the campus. For others, this goal is seen only as rhetoric, leading them to label it derisively as a "multicultural facade." Some see the term "multicultural" as a synonym for "multiracial" referring only to the concerns of people of color. Others understand the term to include most, if not all, of the categories of race, ethnicity, religion, gender, sexual orientation and ability. There are those who expand the reach of the term to mean consideration of all cultures, even that of European-Americans and men, and also those who equate a multicultural campus with mere numerical diversity. Worse yet, the term is increasingly utilized in its noun form, "multiculturalism," as if it were an established concept on the campus.

Lacking shared meaning meaning, these terms are nearly impossible to explain to prospective and new students, parents, alumni, legislators, the citizens of the Commonwealth, and most importantly, ourselves. I hear these terms frequently used every day, but I am certain only that they are used in strikingly different ways. As a psychologist, I have come to think of these terms as a type of Rorschach test, telling us more about the persons using them than the terms themselves. Older terms, such as "civility" and "diversity," continue to have a similar fate. While I am not hopeful that our disagreements about these terms will be resolved quickly, I do believe that our discussion of them could be improved by focusing on definitions, rationale and outcomes associated with our commitment "to achieve a multicultural campus." I make the following suggestions in the hope of sharpening our sense of what "multicultural" and "multiculturalism" might mean on our campus and urge others to make their own views publicly known well.

Distinguish "multicultural" concerns from "social justice" concerns. The undefined use of "multicultural" or "multiculturalism" creates what might be called the "inclusion-dilution dilemma. In other words, with a growing number of cultural groups being included under the "multicultural" umbrella, there is an uneasy sense of an increasing dilution of campus concerns about addressing specific social injustices such as racism. I suggest that we address this dilemma by uncoupling social justice issues from "multiculturalism" and place both terms in our mission statement: "to achieve a socially-just and multicultural campus." A "socially-just" campus is one which is committed to honoring our legal, ethical and moral obligations to create a special place of work and study where no one should have their full participation in campus life curtailed because of harassment, discrimination, intimidation, or persistent incidents of disrespect. A socially-just campus is also one which observes both the letter and the spirit of the law regarding discrimination, Affirmative Action/Equal Opportunity and civil and criminal Civil Rights statutes. This change would allow the exploration of multiculturalism to be as broad and inclusive as possible because it would separate, to some extent, the questions of what cultural information we transmit as an institution of higher learning from questions of how we operate as a socially-just campus.

Develop a rationale for "achieving a socially just and multicultural campus." At present, efforts to create a multicultural campus are largely uniformed by any public debate about why we would want to create such a campus in the first place. I suggest the following reasons as a starting point:

To anticipate and respond effectively to the demographic shifts in race and ethnicity which are increasingly reflected in our society, our state and our students, staff and faculty.

To understand, anticipate and constructively resolve or prevent conflicts of disrespect and intolerance on the campus, especially those which escalate to violence.

To improve the understanding of all members of the campus community regarding diverse cultures and their unique perspectives, both nationally and globally.

To acknowledge the momentum and indisputable logic of civil rights legislation and social change initially focused on African-Americans which has quickly broadened to include gender, other races, ethnicity, national ancestry, religion, sexual orientation and ability in a larger call for social justice.

To reaffirm a Land Grant mission which links University activities to the needs of the citizens of the state who are themselves becoming increasingly diverse and for whom increasing diversity has become a source of both conflict and opportunity.

To assure that all members of the campus can act on the values of free expression and full participation essential to the functioning of a university.

Develop a clear set of outcomes for "achieving a socially-just and multicultural campus." It is very difficult to know if the campus is moving in a desired direction unless we spell out more explicitly the results we expect. With this in mind, I suggest the following broad outcomes, all of which could be further elaborated to serve as the basis of a regular assessment of our progress:

Improvement of the workplace and academic environment at the University so that it can be a special place of learning and work in which all its members can fully participate without the hinderances of disparate treatment.

Increased inclusion of and respect for the full range of American and International constituencies and cultures we are increasingly likely to encounter in our workplaces and home communities.

Development of individual skills and perspectives which will enhance our cultural fluency and consequently our personal effectiveness in an increasingly diverse campus, state, country and global economy.

Enhancement of our abilities to learn quickly and thoughtfully about cultures and subcultures other than our own.

Development of both our conceptual and personal understanding of issues of social power and social justice and their particular places in American and world history.

Heightened awareness of our own cultural contexts and the fact that other individuals and groups may operate within legitimate cultural contexts which may differ significantly from our own.

PROGRESS REPORT REGARDING THE MULTICULTURAL CAMPUS

In keeping with the 11/7/92 ALANA agreements

2/25/93 Funding in the amount of $5,000 was provided by Chancellor O'Brien for books and computer equipment for the Committee for the Collegiate Education of Black and other Minority Students (CCEMBS).

3/1/93 The office of Space Management was asked by Chancellor O'Brien to work with Dr. McBride to locate appropriate space for the substitute program for Upward Bound.

3/3/93 Dr. Elaine Anderson released the results of her independent investigation into the Upward Bound Program. Dr. Anderson cited politics and a more critical peer review in Washington as the major reasons for the Program's loss of funding.

3/4/93 Chancellor O'Brien and Vice Chancellor Tom Robinson met with representatives form ALANA to discuss the status of responses to agreements reached on 11/7/92 between ALANA and the Administration.

Other initiatives taken

2/23/93 A program called "Bridging Worlds" is being sponsored by members of the Afro-American Studies faculty. The program's goal is to "motivate minority and working-class high school students to succeed academically and to develop future plans and goals, which may include going to college."

2/27/93 The Peer Assistance Information and Referral Hotline was created to provide information and referrals to students experiencing harassment and other forms of intimidation. The Hotline will be staffed by students, and anticipates being ready to take calls by 3/29/93.

3/4/93 The Institute for the Healing of Racism held a public forum to discuss the topic: "Healing Racism in American: A Prescription for the Disease".

3/9/93 Chancellor O'Brien provided an additional $15,000 to the Minority Graduate Fellowship Fund.

3/9/93 Four panelists from the University spoke about homophobia at South Hadley High School's Diversity Day. Other workshops were offered on racism, women's rights, male stereotypes and prejudice.

3/12/93 The Fine Arts Center announced that it has reorganized its multicultural programs into one unit called the Multicultural Programs Group, which will be administered by the Office of Special Programs and Cultural Affairs.

3/16/93 Chancellor O'Brien sent copies of the "Calendar of Actions Taken Toward Achieving a Multicultural Campus" the Civility Commission, Multicultural Advisory Board, Affirmative Action Advisory and the Campus Management Council. The groups were asked to provide recommendations and proposals for future activities which might be taken to work toward the goal of a multicultural campus.

YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE
By JEANE DIXON

ARIES (March 21-April 19): You feel important when a VIP takes you into his confidence. Your sound judgement earns you this person's high esteem. Hard work and good organization are the keys to success.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Today you hit your stride. Your magnetic personality convinces others that you are on the right track. A willingness to compromise helps you overcome any resistance.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): The ladder of success looks invitingly easy to scale. Do not begrudge the expense. Respect and encourage a young person's individuality.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Key associates have their own ideas about what should and should not be done. Listen closely. Decisions should not be made without first being discussed with someone trustworthy.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): A shower of funds and financial benefits could come your way. Teamwork is the key; you want to build on mutual resources and strive for shared rewards. Pick up the tempo in romance.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Take time out for a physical check-up. A part-time job is the answer for a student who is short on cash. Loved ones may be touchy for no special reason.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Following through on a hunch will be lucky for you. A leisure-ful venture may link you to powerful people. If so, help your favorite sibling find a job.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Use your charm to win approval from a touchy VIP. Be discreet about any inside information you hear. A cooperative attitude will send a message of good will to your colleagues.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): A relationship cannot be rushed. Neither can a loan. Higher-ups are definitely on your side now. Be a good sport about a temporary sacrifice.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Your influence grows. Your enthusiasm has a positive effect on those around you. Stop overreacting to unimportant developments. Save your energy for the really major issues.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Answers will come quickly once you make your move. Money is available from more than one source. Ask an old friend to lunch. It could be the start to something wonderful.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): The planning you do today will win you recognition by the month's end. Make sure you take care of details to keep VIPs happy. Participate in a popular community event.

North Carolina in Final Four with OT victory

EAST RUTHERFORD, N.J. (AP) — A dunk didn't do the trick in regulation, so North Carolina went to the 3-pointer in overtime and advanced to the Final Four for the ninth time under head coach Dean Smith.

The top-seeded Tar Heels (32-4) had a chance to beat second-seeded Cincinnati (27-5) at the regulation buzzer Sunday, but Brian Reese missed a dunk after taking an inbounds pass with :0.8 seconds to play.

Once the overtime started, Donald Williams took care of things from beyond 19 feet, 9 inches, making consecutive 3-pointers as North Carolina beat the Bearcats 75-68 and kept them from returning to the Final Four.

North Carolina will meet Kansas, the Midwest's second seed which beat top-ranked Indiana 83-77 Saturday, in the national semifinals next Saturday in New Orleans. That is a rematch of the 1991 semifinals when Roy Williams, Smith's long-time assistant beat the Tar Heels when Smith was ejected from the game.

The Tar Heels were in trouble in the first half when Cincinnati guard Nick Van Exel snapped out of a tournament-long shooting slump with 21 points, all but three on 3-point field goals. The Bearcats led by as many as 15 points in the opening 20 minutes. But the Tar Heels rallied to take a lead late in the half and then clamped down on Van Exel, holding him to two points after halftime.

Williams, North Carolina's only legitimate perimeter threat, finished with 20 points, but the big six came on the overtime 3-pointers, which gave the Tar Heels a 74-68 lead with 1:53 to play.

Smith, the winningest coach in NCAA Tournament history with a 53-23 record, has won just one national championship — 1982 in New Orleans, when freshman Michael Jordan hit his famous jumper.

St. John's practiced on their turf field. That says a lot for our kids . . . there aren't many Division I programs who could do that."

The Gorillas' Wednesday home opener with Brown is tentative due to soupy conditions at Garber Field, which is still under snow and unplowed (unlike Harvard, Brown, New Hampshire and Nicholls — all grass fields and all playable). If the Hill is still a swampy mess on Wednesday, the game will most likely be rescheduled for May 4th.

Brown, ranked fifth in the USILA, defeated sixth-ranked Loyola 13-12 on Saturday. Garber said he would rather reschedule the game at home than play Wednesday in Providence due to the game's far-reaching playoff implications.

Gorillas maul Redmen 25-4 in New York

By GREG SUKIENNIK
Collegian Staff

ANDREA MIGLIASSI / COLLEGIAN
The University of Massachusetts lacrosse team defeated St. John's by a 25-4 score. The Gorillas routed the Redmen in the second half and moved up to tenth place in this week's lax poll.

Last weekend, the University of Massachusetts men's lacrosse team showed they had the potential to have a great season in a 10-9 loss at Virginia. Saturday afternoon, they proved they were for real, outscoring St. John's 16-1 in the second half en route to a 25-4 dismantling of the Redmen in Jamaica, Queens, N.Y.

Attackers Wes Depp and Mark Millon both had five goals for the Gorillas (1-1), who broke 14 players into the scoring column. UMass had a 9-2 lead after the first quarter before their 16-1 run turned the game into a rout.

The United States Intercollegiate Lacrosse Association took notice of UMass' win, moving them into the top 10 in this week's poll. The Gorillas moved up three notches to tenth place.

UMass coach Ted Garber, now one win away from his 100th career victory, attributed the lopsided score to a total team effort which saw a minimum of mistakes, constant defensive pressure and a well-run offense which consistently created open shots.

"It could've been 35-4 if we made all our shots, and [St. John's] isn't a bad team," Garber said. "We didn't try to run it up but if you're open you've gotta shoot."

Before leaving for Queens, Garber said he hoped the Gorillas would take control of the game early. But not even Garber could have expected the kind of total dominance UMass demonstrated in Saturday's win. According to Garber, the Gorillas did not let up one 6-on-6 goal all game, and when St. John's did get offensive chances, they either rushed their shots or were forced to shoot from outside.

"Most of their shots were from 12-15 yards away, and when they did get open shots they forced and rushed because our defense dominated," Garber said.

"Our defense did not let up all game," he said. "Before the game I told the team to bring it up a notch from the Virginia game and they did. They played really well."

Depp and Millon both did much of their damage in the first quarter. Millon scored twice and assisted two of Depp's goals. Depp scored four of his five goals in the first quarter. Most remarkable was the fact that Depp's five goals came on five shots.

Senior attacker Andy Fish chipped in two goals, as did Mike Valente, Greg Kline and Eric Triolo. Freshmen Chris Mensoian and Brian Turk cashed in for career-firsts, rounding out a balanced scoring effort for the Gorillas.

Garber said he was expecting a big contribution from Depp this year, and Depp's five shot, five goal performance lived up to Garber's expectations. Garber also pointed to Millon, who finished with five goals and three assists.

Essentially, SJU was never in the game, as Umass rushed out to a 9-3 halftime lead. But even that first-half advantage paled in comparison to the Gorillas' 16-1 second-half onslaught. While the defense refused to allow St. John's to score, the offense, made up of mostly non-starters, rang up what Garber calls "layups" — uncontested, easy shots from close range.

Garber again credited his team for being able to perform without a great deal of outdoors, game situation practice.

"Again, we practiced outside and in parking lots while

Michigan advances, defeats Temple 77-72

SEATTLE (AP) — Michigan, perhaps the best team in the country at playing half a game, is going back to the Final Four after a show of brute power and raw talent overcame a big deficit against Temple.

The Wolverines, aided by a key technical against Temple head coach John Chaney, danced on the court and donned Final Four shirts at the end of their 77-72 victory Sunday, looking ahead to a meeting with Kentucky in New Orleans.

For the third straight game, Michigan played one dismal half and one superb half. Fortunately for the Wolverines, they put together their best play in the second half against the Owls, coming back after trailing by 10 points.

Jalen Rose led Michigan with 17 points, 13 in the second half, as he took control of the offense along with off-guard Jimmy King, who had 14 points. Chris Webber, who survived a beating under the boards, had 13 points and 12 rebounds.

Rick Brunson led Temple (20-13) with 21 points, and Eddie Jones scored 18.

Michigan (30-4) was aided in the final minutes by a technical call against Chaney. The Owls trailed only 67-62 with 1:49 left when Chaney complained about a call.

That allowed Michigan to pull away with five free throws, one technical, two on the call and two more on another play from Michigan's regaining of possession.

From the first bump of the game, Webber landing hard on his butt on the opening tap. Temple took charge, controlling the tempo to grab a 35-27 halftime lead.

Webber spent almost as much time sprawled on the floor as he did running in the opening half. And when he wasn't falling, he was getting the ball picked from his hands or he was throwing away passes.

Once, he slammed the side of his head on the paint after a scoop layup, and moments later he tumbled onto his back when his arm was yanked by little guard Vic Carstarphen.

The game wasn't rough only on the court. The coaches got into the act, verbally. Michigan coach Steve Fisher complained to officials at halftime that Carstarphen should have been hit with a flagrant foul, which would have given Webber two free throws and Michigan possession. But while Fisher argued in vain, Chaney shouted at him, "shut the [expletive] up."

UMass extends Calipari's four-year contract

Fear not, Mullins Center workers — head basketball coach John Calipari has agreed to terms on a contract extension and will be leading the Minutemen on again next year.

University of Massachusetts athletic director Bob Marcum has announced that basketball coach John Calipari and the University have come to terms on an undisclosed contract extension.

Calipari has guided the Minutemen to a 101-57 record in five years at the University, averaging 20 wins per year. Calipari, 34 years old, was an assistant at the University of Pittsburgh and the University of Kansas before taking over at UMass in the 1988-89 season.

After leading UMass to two consecutive Atlantic 10 Conference regular and post-season titles and two straight NCAA berths, many people speculated that Calipari would leave the University. His 1991-92 30-5 Sweet 16 team had the most wins and best success in the NCAA Tournament of any UMass squad.

"I am very happy at the University of Massachusetts," said Calipari. "We've built a great foundation and I look forward to leading the program to the next level.

"This is the time of year that all of the coaching rumors start. I am not interested in any other job at this time."

Calipari, at age 29, inherited a UMass team that had 10 consecutive losing seasons and has built it into one of the biggest basketball powerhouses in the Northeast.

Calipari compiled a 10-18 record his first season at the helm, then guided UMass to two straight NIT appearances, including an NIT Final Four appearance in 1990-91.

Last year's squad was the first team in 30 years to reach the NCAA Tournament, and the 1992-93 NCAA appearance of Calipari's Minutemen marks the first time the school has ever made back-to-back appearances.

Chancellor finalist touts her experience

Promises greater diversity

Claudia I. Mitchell-Kernan, one of three finalists for the UMass chancellorship, addresses students in the Cape Cod Lounge yesterday.

Mitchell-Kernan has been the dean and vice chancellor of graduate programs at the University of California at Los Angeles since 1989. She is also an anthropology professor at UCLA.

"I don't think I know enough about your campus to have a particular plan. What I could share with you is my experiences and processes that have been successful elsewhere," Mitchell-Kernan said. "I imagine they have the potential to be successful on many campuses, including this one."

As an administrator for about 20 years, Mitchell-Kernan has been the involved with the Center for Afro-American Studies at UCLA. She was the Center's director for 12 years.

Mitchell-Kernan said it was important for the University to solicite more funding by building support among the state Legislature and alumni as wells as applying more aggresively for grants. Since the University is a land grant institution, Mitchell-Kernan said it must be accessible to all who students qualify academically.

UCLA is now facing the financial problems that UMass faced three years ago, Mitchell-Kernan said, particularly in regard to decreasing financial aid. UCLA has both a budget shortfall and rising tuition, she said.

Another problem Mitchell-Kernan said she noticed at UMass is that students are worried about campus climate. UCLA started working on attaining a more diverse student body many years ago, and now their freshmen class is half minority, Mitchell-Kernan said.

The UCLA undergraduate student body is half women, with domestic graduate students being 43 to 50 percent women, Mitchell-Kernan said. Although there are many women graduate students in the humanities and biological sciences, she said UCLA is working to increase the number of women in physical sciences and engineering.

"When I delivered the opening comments for our graduate student convocation last year, I counted students from 85 different countries, from 49 states, and from every major ethnic group in the United States," Mitchell-Kernan said.

To retain minority students, she said her administration has worked hard to be pro-active when dealing with issues of insensitivity. Mitchell-Kernan said she held open office hours in addition to having open forums with students and faculty.

UCLA has a diversified curriculum, but to implement it here would take some time, Mitchell-Kernen said, because she would be working with faculty.
